

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 10 DECEMBER, 1868, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 9 FEBRUARY, 1871, IN THE THIRTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF*

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 9th February, 1871.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 10th day of August, 1870, thence to the 27th day of October, thence to the 13th day of December, thence to the 17th day of January, 1871, thence to the 9th day of February; met this day for Despatch of Business.

The Session of PARLIAMENT was opened by THE QUEEN in Person.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY, being seated on the Throne, adorned with Her Crown and Regal Ornaments, and attended by Her Officers of State:—The PRINCE OF WALES (in his Robes) sitting in his Chair on HER MAJESTY'S right hand—(the Lords being in their Robes)—commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, through the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, to let the Commons know "It is Her Majesty's Pleasure they attend Her immediately, in this House."

Who being come, with their Speaker;

The LORD CHANCELLOR, taking Directions from HER MAJESTY, said—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"At an epoch of such moment to the future fortunes of Europe, I am especially desirous to avail myself of your counsels.

"The war which broke out, in the month of July, between France and Germany, has raged, until within the last few days, with unintermitted and likewise with unexampled force : and its ravages may be renewed, after but a few days more, unless moderation and forethought, prevailing over all impediments, shall sway the councils of both the parties, whose well-being is so vitally concerned.

"At the time when you separated, I promised a constant attention to the subject of neutral obligations ; and I undertook to use my best endeavours to prevent the enlargement of the area of the war, and to contribute, if opportunity should offer, to the restoration of an early and honourable peace.

"In accordance with the first of these declarations, I have maintained the rights and strictly discharged the duties of neutrality.

"The sphere of the war has not been extended beyond the two countries originally engaged.

"Cherishing with care the cordiality of my relations with each belligerent, I have forborne from whatever might have been construed as gratuitous or unwarranted interference between parties, neither of whom had shown a readiness to propose terms of accommodation such as to bear promise of acceptance by the other.

"I have been enabled, on more than one occasion, to contribute towards placing the Representatives of the two contending countries in confidential communication : but, until famine compelled the surrender of Paris, no further result had been obtained.

"The Armistice now being employed for the Convocation of an Assembly in France, has brought about a pause in the constant accumulation, on both sides, of human suffering ; and has rekindled the hope of a complete accommodation. I pray that this suspension may result in a Peace compatible, for the two great and brave nations involved, with security and with honour, and likely therefore to command the approval of Europe, and to give reasonable hopes of a long duration.

"It has been with concern that I have found myself unable to accredit My Ambassador in a formal manner to the Government of Defence, which has subsisted in France since the revolution of September ; but neither the harmony nor the efficiency of the correspondence of the two States has been in the smallest degree impaired.

"The King of Prussia has accepted the title of Emperor of Germany at the instance of the chief authorities of the nation.

"I have offered My congratulations on an event, which bears testimony to the solidity and independence of Germany, and which, I trust, may be found conducive to the stability of the European system.

"I have endeavoured, in correspondence with other Powers of Europe, to uphold the sanctity of Treaties, and to remove any misapprehension as to the binding character of their obligations.

"It was agreed by the Powers, which had been parties to the Treaty of 1856, that a Conference should meet in London. This Conference has now been for some time engaged in its labours ; and I confidently trust that the result of its deliberations will be to uphold both the principles of public right and the general policy of the Treaty, and, at the same time, by the revision of some of its conditions in a fair and conciliatory spirit, to exhibit a cordial co-operation among the Powers with regard to the Levant.

"I greatly regret that my earnest efforts have failed to procure the presence at the Conference of any Representative of France, which was one of the chief parties to the Treaty of 1856, and which must ever be regarded as a principal and indispensable Member of the great Commonwealth of Europe.

"At different times, several questions of importance have arisen, which are not yet adjusted, and which materially affect the relations between the United States and the territories and people of British North America. One of them in particular, which concerns the Fisheries, calls for early settlement; lest the possible indiscretion of individuals should impair the neighbourly understanding, which it is on all grounds so desirable to cherish and maintain. I have therefore engaged in amicable communications with the President of the United States. In order to determine the most convenient mode of treatment for these matters, I have suggested the appointment of a joint Commission; and I have agreed to a proposal of the President, that this Commission shall be authorized at the same time, and in the same manner, to resume the consideration of the American claims growing out of the circumstances of the late war. This arrangement will, by common consent, include all claims for compensation which have been, or may be made by each Government, or by its citizens, upon the other.

"The establishment of a Prince of the House of Savoy on the Throne of Spain, by the free choice of the popularly-elected representatives of the Spanish nation, will, I trust, insure for a country which has passed with so much temperance and self-control through a prolonged and trying crisis, the blessings of a stable Government.

"I am unhappily not able to state that the inquiry which was instituted by the Government of Greece into the history of the shocking murders perpetrated during the last spring at Dilessi has reached a termination answerable in all respects to My just expectations, but I shall not desist from My endeavours to secure the complete attainment of the objects of the inquiry. Some valuable results, however, have in the meantime been obtained, for the exposure and the repression of a lawless and corrupting system, which has too long afflicted the Greek Peninsula.

"The anxiety which the massacre at Tien-tsin on the 21st of June last called forth has happily been dispelled; and while it will be My earnest endeavour to provide for the security of My Subjects and their trade in those remote quarters, I count on your concurrence in the policy that I have adopted of recognizing the Chinese Government as entitled to be dealt with in its relations with this country in a conciliatory and forbearing spirit.

"The Parliamentary recess has been one of anxious interest in regard to foreign affairs. But I rejoice to acquaint you that my relations are, as heretofore, those of friendship and good understanding with the Sovereigns and States of the civilized world.

"Papers illustrative of the conduct of My Government in relation to the several matters, on which I have now summarily touched, will be duly laid before you.

"In turning to domestic affairs, I have first to inform you that I have approved of a marriage between my daughter Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, and I have declared my consent to this union in Council.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The revenue of the country flourishes, and the condition of trade and industry may, though with partial drawbacks, be declared satisfactory.

"The estimates for the coming year will be promptly laid before you.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The lessons of military experience afforded by the present war have been numerous and important.

"The time appears appropriate for turning such lessons to account by efforts more decisive than heretofore at practical improvement. In attempting this you will not fail to bear in mind the special features in the position of this country, so favourable to the freedom and security of the people, and if the changes from a less to a more effective and elastic system of defensive military preparation shall be found to involve, at least for a time, an increase of various charges, your prudence and patriotism will not grudge the cost, as long as you are satisfied that the end is important, and the means judicious. No time will be lost in laying before you a Bill for the better regulation of the army and the auxiliary land forces of the Crown, and I hardly need commend it to your anxious and impartial consideration.

"I trust that the powerful interest at present attaching to affairs abroad, and to military questions, will not greatly abate the energy with which you have heretofore applied yourselves to the work of general improvement in our domestic legislation.

"I commend anew to your attention several measures on subjects which I desired to be brought before you during the last Session of Parliament, but which the time remaining at your disposal, after you had dealt with the principal subjects of the year, was not found sufficient to carry to a final issue.

"I refer especially to the Bills on Religious Tests in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, on Ecclesiastical Titles, on the Disabilities of Trade Combinations, on the Courts of Justice and Appeal, on the Adjustment of Local Burdens, and on the Licensing of Houses for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors.

"The inquiry made by a Committee of the Commons House being now complete, a measure will be placed before you on an early day for the establishment of Secret Voting.

"A proposal is anxiously expected in Scotland for the adjustment of the question of primary education. With reference to the training of the young in schools on a national scale and basis, that portion of the country has especial claims on the favourable consideration of Parliament: and I trust the year may not pass by without your having disposed of this question by the enactment of a just and effective law.

"The condition of Ireland with reference to agrarian crime has, in general, afforded a gratifying contrast with the state of that island in the preceding winter; but there have been painful though very partial exceptions.

“To secure the best results for the great measures of the two last Sessions which have so recently passed into operation, and which involve such direct and pressing claims upon the attention of all classes of the community, a period of calm is to be desired; and I have thought it wise to refrain from suggesting to you at the present juncture the discussion of any political question likely to become the subject of new and serious controversy in that country.

“The burdens devolving upon you as the great Council of the nation, and of this ancient and extended Empire, are, and must long continue to be, weighty. But you labour for a country whose laws and institutions have stood the test of time, and whose people, earnestly attached to them, and desiring their continuance, will unite with their Sovereign in invoking upon all your designs the favour and aid of the Most High.”

• Then HER MAJESTY retired.

Then the Commons withdrew.

Bill, pro forma, read 1^a.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMINSTER: My Lords, I have the honour to move an Address in reply to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech which has just been read from the Throne:—and as I have not been long a Member of your Lordships' House, and have not hitherto ventured to take part in its debates, I crave that indulgence which your Lordships never refuse to any under similar circumstances. I have been sent to the front as a skirmisher by the noble Earl (Earl Granville), who commands the forces on this side the House—I presume to feel for an enemy—and as the countenance of my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition (the Duke of Richmond) does not denote hostility to anything or anybody, I may perhaps be bold enough to count, if not upon his concurrence in all that I have to move, at all events upon his “benevolent neutrality.” It is a matter of the highest gratification to your Lordships that Her Majesty should have come down to the House of Lords and have opened in Person a Session which promises to be at any rate not less eventful than those which have preceded it. The political atmosphere as well as the natural atmosphere has been, and is, very overcast and lowering. Light is as necessary to the political world as to the physical, and we are therefore glad to have been enlivened by Her Majesty's presence here to-day, hoping for a repetition of it on many future occasions. Her Majesty has announced to you—as you were before aware—that She has given Her consent to the marriage of Her illustrious daughter the Princess Louise with the Marquess of Lorne, and I am quite sure that your Lordships will heartily join your congratulations to those of the nation on this very auspicious event. Her Majesty has already given three daughters to Germany; but, although it cannot be doubted that after their experience of those fair daughters of England who have become members by marriage of their most illustrious Houses, the Germans would have readily welcomed a fourth, that fourth daughter is destined for Scotland. Your Lordships, I am sure, will join with me in expressing a hope that the union of so much sterling worth and such rare accomplishments may be attended with every possible happiness—that it may be the commencement of a long career of no common usefulness, and which shall for many years be a subject of pride and affection on the part of the country.

My Lords, it must be matter for deep regret that—differing from any Speeches from the Throne which we have heard of late years—there should be in this Speech so many topics of absorbing and painful interest to occupy your attention; but before I advert to these, if you will allow me, I will touch upon a few matters which, if not so exciting as those connected with foreign affairs, are nevertheless of the highest importance to the people of this country. I may advert for a moment to a very important measure, passed last Session, of which your Lordships have had considerable experience during the Recess—I mean the Education Act. Your Lordships are already able in some degree to judge of its operations by having witnessed the great efforts that have already been made for its organization and for the building of schools. I only hope that the advocates of secular education and compulsory attendance will allow a fair period for testing the efficacy of the voluntary efforts which are now being put forth, and that they will wait until it is proved that those efforts are inadequate to meet the emergency before they press their own stronger measures. This brings me to a subject which I am happy to see has obtained a place in the Royal Speech, and which is of the utmost importance in every consideration of the well-being of the country. I allude to the sale of intoxicating liquors. It is often said—"You cannot make men sober by Act of Parliament;" but I believe that the opposite system—or what may be called free trade in drink—such as was tried in Liverpool for five years—would have the most disastrous effect, and that experience has shown that a restrictive system has been productive of more or less good. I will not trouble your Lordships with elaborate statistics; but I may state that the number of persons arrested annually as drunk and disorderly amounts, it has been stated, to 1 in every 180 of the population—that the annual value of the alcoholic liquors consumed in the United Kingdom amounts to the enormous sum of £88,000,000, and that there is a house licensed for the sale of beer or spirits for every 45 males in the United Kingdom. These facts and figures are deserving of consideration, and no part of the Speech from the Throne has given me greater satisfaction than that which holds out a prospect of checking the great evil of intemperance. Your Lordships are not supposed to know anything of elections—and, perhaps, you do not—but some of you have pleasant or unpleasant reminiscences of elections in a previous state of existence. Election experiences are not usually regarded as passages in one's life to which it is very agreeable to look back, and your Lordships will certainly agree with me in thinking that elections may be made purer, cheaper, and certainly quieter. A Committee appointed in "another place" has gone fully into the subject, and has recommended certain measures as remedies for the evils complained of. Amongst these remedies is the Ballot, which at one time was one of "the Five Points of the Charter," and excited considerable agitation. It has been brought forward year after year in the House of Commons, and has been frequently defeated and sometimes successful. Public opinion, however, is now strong in its favour, and the experience of its operation in our Australian Colonies, in Italy, and in America has abundantly proved, in the opinion of the Committee, that while some objections to the system undoubtedly exist, they are more than counterbalanced by its advantages; and I hope, therefore, your Lordships may be induced to adopt it. The old objections commonly urged by Lord Palmerston and others that the suffrage was a public trust, and that those who had no vote were, therefore, entitled to know how the electors discharged that trust, has lost much of its force since the passing of the last Reform Act, by which the franchise was so much extended that the number of those excluded was immensely reduced; while the number of those admitted to the franchise, who by reason of their poverty were open to temptation by bribes, was very greatly extended. I think that no measure introduced on this subject will be complete without provision for the closing of public-houses during the critical time of elections, for the prohibition, as I hope, of canvassing, and for the abolition of public nominations. With regard to another Bill mentioned in the Speech relating to University Tests, the object of which is to enable persons not belonging to the Church of England to become Fellows of Colleges and members of the Governing Body, public opinion has expressed itself strongly in favour of the repeal of these tests; and although the divisions in the other House during the last Session were three to one in favour of the measure proposing such repeal, that Bill was virtually defeated in this House at the instance and by the action of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, on the plea that the safeguards provided by the Bill for insuring the religious character of the Universities were inadequate. I am not aware what action was taken by the Select Committee to which the Bill was consequently referred; but the measure was practically shelved for the Session. Its re-introduction is now announced, and as the crowning point of the legislation on the question, which has already been approved by your Lordships, I trust you will adopt it as a logical sequence. In any case, I hope that the noble Marquess will endeavour to take any action in the matter he may propose at an earlier period than at the end of the Session, when there is no time for a Committee to carry out an inquiry.

My Lords, there is another point connected with our home affairs, mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, on which I desire to remark—the organization of our Army—a matter in which, as many believe, the very existence of the nation is involved. There seem to be many reasons in favour of a full consideration of the subject at the present time. The two great measures relating to Ireland and the Education Bill having been disposed of, time and opportunity happily enable us to consider this question. There is a conviction in the minds of men of all parties that our organization is defective and our armaments weak as regard reserves, supply, artillery, and arsenals. The spirit of the people is all that could be desired; it is admitted that we have the best artillery in the world—that in power of production we are unrivalled—and, added to these favourable circumstances is the fact that we have a strong Government which—I say it with all deference to the opinion of noble Lords opposite—commands such a majority both in the other House and in the country, as to be able, as I am sure they are willing, to carry any measures which would be satisfactory to the country. It is true that against these advantages are to be set the Parliamentary difficulties and jealousies which always beset the question of Army reform—that there are some hon. Members who are pledged to cut down the Estimates at whatever cost; and that there are too frequent changes in the heads of the War Office—one of the most important points. In a clever article in Macmillan for October the qualifications for a War Minister were stated to be these—that he must be a statesman, yet a soldier; an able speaker, yet intimately acquainted with the details of the Army and its requirements; that he must be firm, yet conciliatory; and, above all, that he must remain a sufficiently long time in Office to be able to carry out his plans. The article went on to speak of the difficulty of finding such a man. I believe, however, that Her Majesty's Government are strong enough to surmount all these difficulties. There seems to be a concurrence of opinion—but in saying this I wish to guard myself against being supposed to know anything of the details of the measure about to be proposed—but there seems to be a strong feeling in favour of making a real reserve of the Militia. The problem to be solved appears to be the training in time of peace of a large body of men in such a manner that, in the event of war, they would be available to fill up the ranks of the regular Army. Opinion appears likewise to be in favour of increasing our artillery and completing and properly arming our forts and arsenals. The question, in fact, is not so much a question of increased numbers as of the superior organization and efficiency of the force we already possess. In carrying out measures of this kind, some increase of expenditure will, of course, be necessary; but this the country will accept with the view of averting far heavier sacrifices. It is not for me to give an opinion on compulsory service, which, however, is advocated by men of the greatest eminence in the profession; nor will I touch upon the commissariat, the equipment of the Army, the purchase system, and other matters all deserving of attention. Being, like many of your Lordships, a sort of half soldier, I am perhaps ipso facto disqualified to give any opinion on military matters; but I may be permitted, with propriety, to remark that in the Volunteers we have excellent material and a very loyal and patriotic force, armed with excellent weapons. Engaged as the greater number of our Volunteers are in business, it is unreasonable to expect any large amount of drill from them; but still I believe you might get a larger amount of drill from them than you now do; and if you do that, and give them officers who have learnt their duty by actual practice in the field, the Volunteers may be made a valuable line of defence within the country, while I am sure that their patriotism and loyalty will be equal to any call made upon them. I remember a distinguished officer telling them in Hyde Park that with only a fortnight's continuous drill he could do anything with them. I trust that on this question all party recrimination will be avoided, for it is one on which assistance, not criticism, is required.

My Lords, I will now advert for a short time to Foreign Affairs. This part of the Speech from the Throne offers a painful contrast to that of last Session, the opening paragraph of which was in these terms—

"The growing disposition to resort to the good offices of allies in cases of international difference, and the conciliatory spirit in which several such cases have been recently treated and determined, encourage Her Majesty's confidence in the continued maintenance of the general tranquillity."

On this passage some remarks were made by the Seconder of the Address in "another place"—Sir Charles Dilke—which also contrast painfully with the circumstances of the present time. After referring to the instances in which tranquillity had been preserved, mainly through our own mediation, he referred to the happily increased chances of the maintenance of peace by the triumph of the principle of popular Sovereignty in France and Spain, and by the subsidence of the angry feeling lately existing among the people of the United States towards this country. With many of those remarks I cordially agree; but it must be admitted that the Americans are a peculiar people, and that the recent conduct of the House of Representatives has been, to say the least, extravagant: and it must be matter of regret that so many of the best men of the United States keep aloof altogether from politics. There can, however, be no doubt that both nations desire peace and a speedy settlement of the differences which, unhappily, exist, and I hope that the disputes which have recently arisen as to the fisheries will be soon adjusted.

My Lords, as the homely proverb says, "It never rains but it pours," and your Lordships will agree with me that the position of the noble Earl below me (Earl Granville) is not a very enviable one. In the middle of all his troubles, which must have tried even his temper, Prince Gortchakoff's announcement, that the Emperor of Russia deemed himself no longer bound by the Treaty of 1856, came like a thunderclap on England and on the Foreign Office. One of the conditions of that Treaty limits the naval power of Russia in the Black Sea, both as regards vessels and arsenals on the coast. Certainly if ever a Monarch was under obligations which should be observed, this is a case in point. The spirited protest of the noble Earl will be in your Lordships' recollection. It must be remembered that at the time when the Emperor of Russia entered upon the Treaty in question, it was at the end of the war; when England and her allies were in possession of the Crimea and of the Black Sea; when Russia was exhausted; while England was able and ready to continue the war, if necessary, alone. Peace was made, moreover, without any concession of territory, and without the claim of a pecuniary indemnity. The question now raised has, at the suggestion of Count Bismarck, been referred to a Conference, and I hope to hear in good time from the noble Earl that there is still left a sense of honour, justice, and good faith on the part of those who have bound themselves by treaties. Whatever course other nations may take, I hope we shall never see the time when England is indifferent to the obligations she has undertaken. It is not possible—living, as we do, so near the Continent—that we shall ever be able to carry out in its integrity a policy of non-intervention; but it is clear it behoves us to be extremely cautious as to what treaties we enter into for the future.

My Lords, I will say but few words with regard to the war and its effect upon this country. At the commencement of the noble Earl's career in the Foreign Office he had to deal with the candidature of Prince Hohenzollern for the Spanish Throne; and in this matter his efforts were crowned with success. But after the withdrawal of that candidature, the next step was the declaration of the war by France. The efforts of the noble Earl were then directed to persuade France to submit her grievances and demands to the arbitration of friendly Powers, in accordance with a principle to which France was an assenting party:—but this was refused. These efforts failing, the noble Earl endeavoured to maintain a strict neutrality, and his success in doing so has been in a great measure shown by the complaints preferred against us by both belligerents—complaints that are fully rebutted by the analogous conduct of those very Powers at times when we were engaged in war, and by international usages. If we supplied munition of war to France, we were also ready to furnish Germany with whatever she required; and the sympathy of English people for the victims of the war had been manifested by the enormous sums subscribed for the sick and wounded—the whole wealth of England has been laid under contribution for their relief—and at this very moment an almost incredible quantity of provisions are on their way to prevent the people of Paris from starving. It is a great matter of satisfaction that the independence of Belgium has been secured—that within hearing of the guns of Metz her neutrality was preserved unimpaired; and all classes of her people have expressed their gratitude in the warmest possible terms for the protection afforded her by England. The noble Earl has, moreover, been in constant communication with the other neutral Powers, with the view of localizing the war. As to mediation, it was refused first by France, and after Sedan the new Government made the famous and unfortunate declaration—“We will not give up an inch of our soil or a stone of our fortresses”—a declaration which threw great obstacles in the way of mediation. M. Jules Favre had constantly pressed the noble Earl to mediate; but the latter found it impossible to do so, as Germany insisted on a cession of territory, while France would only concede a pecuniary indemnity. Failing mediation, the French Executive declared war à outrance—with what result we all know. There is now, happily, a prospect of peace; from our point of view the interests of future tranquillity will certainly not be furthered by the annexation to Germany of Alsace and Lorraine or Metz. From no point of view, indeed, is it reasonable to expect that the interests of peace can be furthered by crushing a beaten and prostrate foe, or by the annexation of provinces whose people do not and are not likely to possess any sympathies with Germany; and though we may all think that France has received a condign and not undeserved punishment, it is to be hoped that so great a conqueror as the German Emperor will show some generosity to a fallen rival. It is not for me to express any opinions on such matters; but with all these horrors so near us, it is a subject for heartfelt thanks that we have been spared the unspeakable miseries of war. We must, under God, depend on ourselves, if not for peace under all circumstances, yet to make our country perfectly safe from invasion. The noble Marquess concluded by moving the following humble Address to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for Her Most Gracious Speech from the Throne:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

“WE, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks for Your Majesty's gracious Speech addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

“We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that, in accordance with Your gracious promise to pay constant attention to the subject of neutral obligations, Your Majesty has maintained the rights and strictly discharged the duties of neutrality during the war unhappily prevailing between France and Germany, and which we humbly trust with Your Majesty may, under the influence of moderation and forethought in the Councils of both sides, shortly be terminated.

"We rejoice to learn that the sphere of the war has not been extended beyond the two countries originally engaged.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that cherishing with care the cordiality of Your Majesty's relations with both belligerents, Your Majesty has forborne from whatever might be construed as gratuitous or unwarranted interference between Parties, neither of whom had shown a readiness to propose terms of accommodation, such as to bear promise of acceptance by the other; and for informing us that Your Majesty has been enabled, on more than one occasion, to contribute towards placing the Representatives of the two contending countries in confidential communication, though unfortunately until famine compelled the surrender of Paris no further result had been obtained.

"We humbly unite with Your Majesty in praying that the suspension in the constant accumulation, on both sides, of human suffering which has been brought about by the Armistice, now employed for the convocation of an Assembly in France, may result in a Peace, compatible, for the two great and brave nations involved, with security and honour, and likely therefore to command the approval of Europe, and to give reasonable hopes of a long duration.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that, though unable to accredit Your Majesty's Ambassador in a formal manner to the Government of Defence which had subsisted in France since the revolution of September, neither the harmony nor the efficiency of the correspondence of the two states has been at all impaired.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty's congratulations have been offered to the King of Prussia on the assumption by His Majesty of the title of Emperor of Germany, which we trust, while bearing testimony to the solidity and independence of Germany, may be found conducive to the stability of the European system.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has endeavoured, in correspondence with other Powers of Europe, to uphold the sanctity of Treaties, and to remove any misapprehension as to the binding character of their obligations.

"We humbly join with Your Majesty in confidently trusting that the result of the deliberations of the Conference which it was agreed by the Powers, who had been parties to the Treaty of 1856, should meet in London, may result in upholding both the principles of public right and the general policy of the Treaty, and at the same time, by the revision of some of its conditions in a fair and conciliatory spirit, exhibit a cordial co-operation among the Powers with regard to the Levant.

"We regret to learn that Your Majesty's earnest efforts have failed to procure the presence at the Conference of any Representative of France, which was one of the chief parties to the Treaty of 1856, and which must ever be regarded as a principal and indispensable member of the great Commonwealth of Europe.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has entered into amicable communication with the President of the United States for the settlement of the several questions of importance which are not yet adjusted, and which materially affect the relations between the United States and the territories and people of British North America; and that in order to determine the most convenient mode of treatment for these matters, Your Majesty has suggested the appointment of a joint Commission, which, at the proposal of the President, will be authorized at the same time, and in the same manner, to resume the consideration of the American claims growing out of the circumstances of the late war, and that this arrangement will, by common consent, include all claims for compensation which have been or may be made by each Government, or by its citizens, on the other.

"We humbly join with Your Majesty in deploring that the inquiry which was instituted by the Government of Greece into the history of the shocking murders perpetrated during the last spring at Dilessi has not reached a termination answerable in all respects to Your Majesty's just expectations, and we humbly thank Your Majesty for assuring us, that you will not desist from Your Majesty's endeavours to secure the complete objects of the inquiry.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we learn with pleasure that the anxiety called forth by the massacre at Tien-tsin on the 21st of June last has happily been dispelled; and that it has been Your Majesty's earnest endeavour to provide for the security of Your Majesty's subjects and their trade in those remote quarters, while recognizing the Chinese Government as entitled to be dealt with, in its relations with this country, in a conciliatory and forbearing spirit.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that during these critical times Your Majesty's relations are, as heretofore, those of friendship and good understanding with the Sovereigns and States of the civilized world.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Your Majesty has given directions for papers illustrative of the conduct of Your Majesty's Government in relation to these general matters to be duly laid before us.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has been pleased to approve of a marriage between Your Majesty's daughter Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, and we humbly assure Your Majesty that we trust that this union may be prosperous and happy.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that in considering the important lessons afforded by the present war, we shall not fail to bear in mind the special features in the position of this country, so favourable to the freedom and security of the people, and if the changes from a less to a more effective and elastic system of defensive military preparation shall be found to involve, at least for a time, an increase of various charges, we shall not grudge the cost, so long as we are satisfied that the end is important and the means judicious; and we humbly assure Your Majesty that we shall give our anxious and impartial consideration to the Bill which Your Majesty informs us will shortly be laid before us.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our best attention will be given to the general work of our domestic legislation, including the several measures which were brought before us during the last Session of Parliament, but which the time remaining at our disposal was not found sufficient to carry to a final issue.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the inquiry made by a Committee of the Commons House respecting Secret Voting is now complete, and that a Bill will be laid before us on that subject.

"We humbly join with Your Majesty in trusting that the question of primary education in Scotland may this year be adjusted by the enactment of a just and effective law.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the condition of Ireland with reference to agrarian crime has, in general, afforded a gratifying contrast with the state of that island in the preceding winter, although there have been painful but very partial exceptions; and we humbly concur with Your Majesty in considering that after the great measures of the two last Sessions which have so recently passed into operation, and which involve such direct and pressing claims upon the attention of all classes of the community, a period of calm is to be desired; and we humbly join with Your Majesty in thinking it wise to refrain from suggesting, at the present juncture, the discussion of any political questions likely to become the subject of new and serious controversy in that country.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we fervently join with Your Majesty's prayers that all our designs may receive the favour and aid of the Most High."

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I rise to second the Address moved by the noble Marquess. And in doing so I would plead that that favour and indulgence which your Lordships are accustomed to show to all who for the first time address this House, may be extended to me in even a larger measure on account of my extreme youth and inexperience. Moreover, I do not think that anyone who heard the speech of the noble Marquess can fail to appreciate the difficulty and hesitation with which I approach the discussion of questions which he has already treated with such distinguished ability.

Before I proceed to the actual consideration of Her Majesty's gracious Speech, I would refer to one event in connection with it—that Her Majesty has deigned to be present at its delivery to-day—a circumstance which affords joy not merely to the Legislature itself, but also to the entire nation: while it is rendered the more interesting in that Her Majesty has thus in person announced to us the marriage of her daughter, the Princess Louise, with the Marquess of Lorne—an alliance dictated not by the pride of dynasty, or the traditions of State policy, but by the purest affection, and therefore additionally welcome to the English nation. My Lords, I hope and believe that the noble Marquess will prove himself worthy of this high distinction, and that he will do so in the most fitting and natural manner by treading in the steps of the noble Duke the Secretary of State for India.

Your Lordships will have heard with satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government are considering the question of the re-organization of the land forces of this country. I think I should be best consulting your Lordships' wishes by refraining from the discussion of this question—more especially after the able remarks of the noble Marquess—until the Government measure be laid before us. But I may express a hope that the British Army may by that scheme be raised to a standard of full efficiency, without interference with industrial pursuits, or undue pressure upon the national taxation.

Your Lordships will also have heard with gratification of the contemplated measure for the fusion of law and equity, and the establishment of a High Court of Justice. And I think that I do not speak without book when I say that the efforts of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack during the last Session in this direction met, in principle at least, with the approbation of your Lordships; so that we may hope that a settlement of this difficult and laborious question is not now remote.

My Lords, I now come to the paragraph in the Speech of paramount importance to many in this House—to none more so than myself: I mean that relating to education in Scotland. No country deserves more than Scotland that her educational efforts should be fostered by the Imperial Government, because in no country is there such an intense solicitude on the subject. The leaders of public opinion in Scotland—from Knox to Chalmers—have universally and persistently urged upon their fellow-countrymen the necessity of an adequate system of national education; and the result is, what everyone who has spent a few weeks in that country will have observed, that in every class of the community, from the highest to the lowest, there is a craving for mental improvement. Nothing is so common in Scotland as to see a peasant working with his hands for six months of the year that he may be able to spend the winter at one of the Scotch Universities; barely obtaining the necessaries of life with the pittance he had saved from his earnings in the summer. The Government Bill relates only to elementary education; but I have mentioned this to prove that it should be a labour of love to the Legislature to further education in a country where there is such a thirst for knowledge.

My Lords, I now come to a measure affecting the higher part of education—I mean the repeal of the University Tests. I think I am justified in saying that public opinion has expressed itself strongly in favour of the Government measure. I will not trouble your Lordships with the allusion—trite and time-honoured in connection with this question—of the Sibylline books. But I would say that the subject is brought into greater prominence at the present moment by the fact that, for I think the third time within the last few years, the Senior Wrangler of this year is a Dissenter: that is to say, that a young man who has attained the highest intellectual distinction of his University, has now reached a door which to him, as a Dissenter, is closed, beyond which lie the honours, rewards and emoluments which would be lavished upon him were he a member of the dominant Church. To him a Christian gentleman, who has placed himself among the foremost men of his University, that University, his Alma mater—my Lords, I should rather say his injuncta nocerca—has said, “Thus far you may come, but no farther.” My Lords, I am not a servile adherent of the Government measure. I would vote for any other which, while it secured to such men as Mr. Hartog and Mr. Hopkinson the rewards which are their due, and their services to the Universities, would, on the other hand, appease the fears of those who think that the Church of England would be endangered by the Government Bill.

Her Majesty's Speech refers—with a satisfaction which will be shared by all—to the circumstance that two questions which have for a long time been a subject of difference between this country and the United States are to be referred to a joint Commission from both countries: I mean the questions of the Canadian Fisheries and the Alabama Claims. It is, of course, the interest of certain politicians of both countries to keep these questions open and make capital out of them; but I cannot believe that two great nations, under the guidance of enlightened statesmen, kindred in blood, in language, and in political sympathy, can, in the interests of that civilization which they both have so much at heart, long remain divided by such questions as these.

My Lords, you will also rejoice, more especially in view of the ghastly drama which is being enacted on the Continent, in hearing of Her Majesty's friendly relations with all foreign Powers. We have since we last met seen great changes in Southern Europe: we have seen an ancient Monarchy accept a new dynasty, and one of the oldest Sovereignities of the world abruptly terminated: events most interesting and important at any other time, but completely dwarfed by occurrences elsewhere. And this leads me to the subject which fills all our minds. My Lords, I pause on the threshold of this great subject: I feel that I owe you another apology for even venturing upon it. Towards the close of last Session a war was being commenced. A great Monarch, at the head of a mighty army, moving on the bases of impregnable fortresses, confident from its unrivalled reputation and great traditions, was moving against the King of Prussia, at the head of another army. In less than a month that army had disappeared, those fortresses were hopelessly blockaded, and that great Monarch—the man who for 10 years had swayed the destinies and kept the conscience of Europe—was a prisoner in the hands of the enemy. My Lords, I ask you if any words in any language can compass such a catastrophe: and yet this was but the beginning. While these events were occurring the course of Her Majesty's Government was plain: they had to keep four points in view. First, the preservation of our own neutrality; secondly, the neutrality of Belgian territory; thirdly, the establishment of an understanding between the neutral Powers which should limit the area of the war—not a league, which would have fettered the free action of separate Governments in their efforts to mediate: and, fourthly, the attainment of a peace, or at least of an armistice, which might allow of terms of peace being discussed. There can hardly, I think, be any difference of opinion as to the success of the Government in attaining the two first objects. Their success in the first has, as the noble Marquess pertinently remarked, been proved by the complaints that have been addressed to us by both belligerents. We gave our countenance to both nations, and received, as Christians are apt to do under the circumstances, buffets on either cheek. In the third object Her Majesty's Government were equally successful: except so far, that Russia, from the connection of her dynasty with Prussia, preferred not joining in public remonstrances against the Prussian policy, when she had more private and effectual means of urging her views. The fourth of these presented obstacles that were almost insuperable. On both sides there were exalted views, on the side of Prussia there was a sensitiveness amounting almost to repugnance at the least interference of the neutral Powers.

It may be said that they would rather have conceded an ell to France than an inch to the neutral Powers. I now come to another obstacle. After the disaster of Sedan the people of Paris had risen and overturned the reigning dynasty, some leading politicians had undertaken the Government, and, under the inspiration of the nation, had proclaimed, "Resistance to the death." My Lords, I know of nothing in history so grand as the manner in which, when her armies had melted away like snow before the sun, when her fortresses were beleaguered, when her Executive was either captive or fled, when all, in fact, that represented civil organization or warlike power had vanished, Paris, who for 18 years had given herself up to luxury and deified pleasure, came forward to endure bombardment and famine and death, in order to become the nucleus of the defence of France. For four months she held on, she fed her population of epicures on husks and rats, yet there was little repining and no crime. But, my Lords, heroic as the situation was, it was one of great difficulty for the neutral Powers. There was a dual Government: one a Government of eloquence in the country, the other necessarily a Government of silence in the capital. The one required instructions, the other required news. My Lords, under these circumstances neutrals could do but little. But, as far as their power went in the way of preparing the road for negotiations, of hinting to the one side the wishes that the other was too proud to express, in the way, in fact, of doing all that a neutral can do, without direct interference, Her Majesty's Government displayed zeal, tact, and judgment. And now, at last, there is an armistice—an armistice, let us hope, that will ripen into a durable peace. Meanwhile, we have seen the King of Prussia proclaimed Emperor in the Palace of Lewis the Fourteenth. The warmest good wishes of this country must go forth to the new Confederation; the warm wish of this country will be to see this historic Empire prove that she cannot merely conquer, but also use her conquests with magnanimity, and that when this disastrous war is concluded she may use her great power in the interests of peace and civilization.

But, my Lords, what shall we say of France? I believe that to those who have faith in the great destinies of that great country—and I confess that I am one of them—that faith will be not merely unshaken, but rendered more profound by the events of the present war. I believe that the time will come when France will look back to these bitter calamities with even thankfulness, as being the trial—the crucial trial—from which she emerged to a higher and purer state of liberty than she had ever previously known. She may well be thankful if they have taught her to despise the empty love of military glory, the endless desire of territorial aggrandisement, the restless anxiety for supremacy in Europe, which have so long distinguished her policy. This miserable war is due not so much to the Emperor and his advisers as to those quack orators who, for four years, preached to France that the aggrandisement of Prussia was an insult to France; that the establishment of a powerful nationality on her borders was a menace; that France should be an Empire surrounded by duchies and provinces. My Lords, I believe that we shall live to see France far greater in the councils of Europe, by her moral authority, than she ever was by her armies.

My Lords, among the numerous engines of war which have recently been discovered or re-adapted, we must all have noticed the versatile and irrepressible nature of the diplomatic circular. Every event of the war has been preceded or followed by a cloud of these missives. I believe that if Jupiter were to return to earth, and re-commence his courtship of Danae, he would woo her in a shower of diplomatic circulars. We have had circulars about the origin of the war; circulars to prove that Count Benedetti was a knave; circulars to prove that he was merely the reverse; circulars about split bullets and the Geneva cross; circulars to prove that the Treaty which guaranteed Luxemburg was a sacred obligation; circulars to prove that the Treaty of Paris is not worth the paper it is written on. My Lords, I would say a few words on the last of these—a very few words, as the subject is one of great delicacy, while a Conference is sitting to decide the question. When the circular of Prince Gortchakoff appeared, it astounded Europe. It was felt that, although the signatory Governments would, in times of peace, willingly have re-considered provisions of the Treaty which were galling to a great Power like Russia, the manner of that circular, and the moment at which it was delivered, were equally inopportune. It was felt that it was not the moment to revise the Treaty of Paris when one of the chief signatory Powers was, so to speak, in extremis. Nor was it considered that the mere expression of the Emperor of Russia's wishes on the subject was the right means of attaining the object. These views were expressed by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in a circular which, I think I may say, elicited the praise not merely of England but of the whole of Europe. But, at the suggestion of Prussia, a Conference was agreed to which should discuss the question without prejudice of any point; that Conference is now sitting, and, I believe I may add, with every prospect of arriving at a favourable result.

My Lords, I have only one word more to say, and that is to thank you from the bottom of my heart for the patience and indulgence with which you have listened to me. I thank you the more because I believe that there is no more solemn moment in the life of an Englishman than that on which he is at first privileged to take part in the deliberations of the National Senate. To your favour and kindness, my Lords, am I indebted for lightening to me the responsibility of that moment. My Lords, in conclusion, I beg to second the Address which has just been moved by my noble Friend. [See Page 18.]

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords—In the first place, before entering upon the remarks I am about to offer to your Lordships, I wish to express my gratification at the admirable speech in which the noble Marquess moved the Address, and the conspicuous ability with which it was seconded by the noble Earl who has just sat down. It often falls to the lot of those who rise on this side of the House to make a statement of this kind; but I can assure both those noble Lords that I intend my words to be not mere empty compliment, but a distinct expression of the opinion I formed while listening to the speeches which they have delivered.

My Lords—It has been for many years the custom that your Lordships should abstain, except under very extraordinary circumstances, from moving any Amendment to the Address moved in answer to the Speech from the Throne. On this occasion there are, I think, ample reasons why we should adhere to that course, and why the proceedings of your Lordships should be of a unanimous character. My first reason, and the chief one, is because we have had the happiness this day of seeing our most gracious Sovereign in sufficiently good health to take part in the public business of the country, seated on the Throne in this House while her Speech was being delivered to us. Another reason is that Her Majesty informed your Lordships in that Speech that an event of the greatest interest to herself—and if of great interest to herself, of necessity to the country at large and to your Lordships—was about to occur—namely, the marriage of the Princess Louise with the Marquess of Lorne. I am sure your Lordships, as well as the country, are deeply interested in everything which concerns the happiness and the comfort of the Queen, and all those composing her family circle:—and it is on this account mainly I rejoice to find no reasons whatever for asking your Lordships to agree to any Amendment to the Address which has just been moved. Having now briefly noticed that part of the Speech which I look upon as personal to the Sovereign, I will say a few words respecting those paragraphs of it which are more closely connected with Her Majesty's Advisers than with Her Majesty herself, and, therefore, in whatever comments I may make I must be understood to intend no disrespect towards the Crown. The first subject that is alluded to in Her Majesty's Speech is one that would naturally be prominently put forward in an Address of this kind—namely, the state of affairs on the Continent. We must all deeply regret that the dreadful war which has been waged for so long a period, and which must have the most disastrous effects upon both parties—I refer to the great desolation and the great misery that must necessarily be produced by it, both in Germany and France—has not yet come to an end. I do not think it would be wise, if it were possible, to attempt to comment on the conduct of the Government with regard to the position they have taken upon this question until all the Papers connected with it have been produced which Her Majesty in her Speech has promised shall be shortly laid on the Table. I must, however, say it seems to me that some of the language of these paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne is open to observation. I will call your Lordships' attention, and the attention of the noble Earl (Earl Granville), who, I have no doubt, will answer me, to that paragraph which states—

“Cherishing with care the cordiality of my relations with each belligerent, I have forborne from whatever might have been construed as gratuitous or unwarranted interference between parties.”

Now, I must say, judging from some speeches that have been made out of doors, the Government have a very curious idea of the meaning of “cordiality.” Your Lordships all know that it is the habit of Members of Parliament during the Recess to meet their constituents—and we know that in the newspapers there is a portion sometimes assigned to the “Speeches of Members out of town.” No particular importance is attached to the utterance of unofficial Members; but when a Minister of the Crown addresses his constituents his language is of great import, owing to the position he occupies. Now, among the speeches of Members who addressed their constituents in the autumn, I find one attributed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. What does he say with reference to what Her Majesty calls “the cordiality of my relations with each belligerent?” Mr. Bruce, speaking at Paisley on the 30th of September, said—

“Those who asked why, if this was a war simply to repel aggression, Germany was not satisfied when that aggression was repelled, might as well ask why when a housebreaker entered a house the occupier was not contented with throwing him out of the window. The desire naturally was to take steps to prevent the housebreaker from repeating his burglarious entrance.”

That is to say, if it means anything, the Home Secretary likens France to a housebreaker, and says that Germany ought not to be satisfied by throwing him out of the window. So much for the opinion of the Home Secretary as to cordiality of relations. It might be said that the Home Secretary is only one Member of the Government, and spoke his own opinion only; but the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, observed—

"When the present Government took office, it was said that its Members could not act together; but I would now say that a more united Cabinet never guided the destinies of the country."

Well, in that case, and if the right hon. Gentleman was the mouthpiece of the views of the English Cabinet, and if they all regard France as a burglar who deserved to be thrown out of window, I think that the cordiality of our relations with that country was cherished by the English Government in a manner peculiarly their own, and little likely to be appreciated by the French nation. I, for one, shall very much rejoice if Her Majesty's Government should be able to prove to us and the country that they have done all in their power to act between these two great countries in a manner befitting that character of neutrality which they professed to sustain—and which the country has endorsed—in regard to the operations on the Continent. No doubt during the last few days affairs appear to have taken a more favourable turn, giving a somewhat better hope of a peaceful solution of these difficulties. We must all be anxious in the interests of the nations that the result should be peace, and that the peace should be of a lasting character; but it must not be forgotten that it will be very difficult to make any peace lasting unless there be a strong Government in France, which may be able to induce the people to agree to what must, under the circumstances of the present case, be most harassing, distressing, and annoying to their feelings.

I pass over several paragraphs till I come to one of great importance in relation to the position of this country and the despatch of Prince Gortchakoff. It is perfectly true that in the Speech there is—perhaps intentionally—no absolute mention of the despatch of Prince Gortchakoff, or of the answer that was made to it by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville); but there can be no doubt that in the paragraph to which I refer that despatch is alluded to. Her Majesty says—

"I have endeavoured, in correspondence with other Powers of Europe, to uphold the sanctity of Treaties, and to remove any misapprehension as to the binding character of their obligations."

We all know that Prince Gortchakoff wrote a despatch of a most startling character; the noble Earl wrote an answer to it; and the country naturally

are very much alive to what is going on, and very anxious to know what the result will be. The whole appears to have collapsed, I may say, into a Conference. The Conference is to assemble, but we are not told how. We are told—

Now, is that an accurate statement of fact? I rather think it is not, because the next paragraph goes on to say—

Therefore, a Conference was to be held to discuss this despatch written by Prince Gortchakoff, and the Treaty of 1856, to which France was one of the chief parties. Yet France was not present. First we are told that the Conference is agreed to by the Powers which were parties to the Treaty of 1856, and then we are told that France had nothing on earth to do with it. That is a difference in terms which I cannot reconcile. I want to know where was the necessity for hurrying on the Conference if—as I quite agree—it was absolutely necessary that France should be represented at it? Your Lordships will also examine the Papers, when they are submitted to you, with great interest to learn what steps have been taken to assure the result being binding on Russia, if the Conference comes to any decision on the subjects to be submitted to it. That is a most important point, to which we shall be better able to address ourselves when we come to consider the Papers which are to be laid on the Table. I now come to that paragraph of the Speech which relates to America, and again I find myself under the necessity of questioning the strict accuracy of the statement. About the middle of the paragraph it is stated—

"In order to determine the most convenient mode of treatment for these matters, I have suggested the appointment of a joint Commission."

There we are told that a joint Commission is suggested, and in the next line we are told that—

the consideration of the American claims growing out of the circumstances of the late war."

Therefore I conclude that as this suggestion has been accepted, the appointment of the Commission may be considered un fait accompli. I hope that we shall soon hear exactly what the terms are on which the Commission will be authorized to act. Are they to include all the claims that have been or may be made by one Government upon the other? If so, that would be equivalent to an inquiry into the whole of what are commonly called "the Alabama claims;" and I should like to know whether it is to be upon the bases agreed on by the late Lord Derby, and if they are different, why that difference had been made, and what circumstances have arisen to call for it? Upon all these points we require more information. The next paragraph is a rather remarkable one. It refers to the unhappy murder of Englishmen in Greece, and states that the inquiry instituted by the Greek Government has not, "unhappily, arrived at a termination answerable in all respects to My just expectations." Now, I believe the only result of that inquiry has been the incarceration of an Englishman, and that upon application being made for his release, the Greek Government replied that the law must take its course. I therefore cannot but think that, so far as that affair is concerned, the inquiry has not had any very satisfactory consequence. Her Majesty then states in her Speech—

That is a declaration which I rejoiced to hear; but, taking a view of the state of things all around, I must think that, to say the least, that is a somewhat exaggerated statement. The next paragraph in the Royal Speech to which I shall call attention is one relating to the Revenue, and in which Her Majesty states—"The Estimates for the coming year will be promptly laid before you." Now, I wish to call attention to a very remarkable omission in this paragraph. It is rather a singular circumstance, seeing that on scarcely any former occasion—and certainly never in a Speech made during the Administration of a Cabinet whose watch-word is Retrenchment and Economy, has there been such an omission. I allude to the fact that there is no mention made that the Estimates have been framed with a due regard to economy. It may be that the Government are beginning to see the error of their ways, and that the doctrine of retrenchment as interpreted by them is one which can never be successfully carried out by any Government. With regard to the Civil Service, we all know how retrenchment has been carried out in that branch—the Departments were supposed to be overstocked with clerks, and they were reduced accordingly, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets credit for the great decrease of expenditure. Now, what is the opinion of the Home Minister as to the conduct of public business? He has stated in his speech—

The administrative work of all the Departments had been enormously added to; the number of Ministers had not been increased, while the business of their offices had been greatly augmented, and that was a state of things which, unless some remedy was applied, would result in a position of great difficulty."

If that statement were correct, why had there been all that recent casting off of clerks? The observation seems rather to imply that more clerks, and perhaps more Ministers, were necessary; and at any rate, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own showing, a position of great difficulty may be looked for. Is that a proof of the wisdom of indiscriminate retrenchment, carried out to satisfy a cry rather than from any real necessity? The only result will be, that in the end you will have to increase the offices again by the addition of more clerks. My Lords—I next come to that very important portion of the Speech which refers to the subject of the national defences. I am not going to enter into any prophecy as to what the measures of the Government will be, or as to what would be, in my opinion, the most desirable method of proceeding; but of this I am certain, that judging from everything one hears of, and is able to gather respecting the opinion of the country, that it will not be satisfied unless the Government is prepared to deal with the subject in a comprehensive manner, so as to put the country in a position that will make it prepared for any present emergency, or for any difficulty that may arise in the future; and I am certain that any scheme that will put an end to such alternative fits between parsimony and extravagance as we have lately witnessed will receive the unanimous support of the country. I read in the paper the other day a letter written by a noble Earl (Earl Russell), in which he says that "Mr. Cardwell's mission was to retrench." Well, that is no doubt true. The right hon. Gentleman came into Office with the avowed object of retrenchment, and one of the first things he did was to cut off 20,000 men from the Army, and I presume about £2,000,000 from the expenditure. Well, but what took place at the end of last Session? Why, Mr. Cardwell had to put on 20,000 men. I should like to ask him, if I had the opportunity, and as I have not I will ask the noble Earl opposite, whether the putting on of 20,000 men did not cost much more than the taking off of them saved; and, moreover, whether the 20,000 men so put on were not a much worse and more useless article than those who had been taken off? The 20,000 men added to the Army at the end of last Session must be raw recruits, and anyone who knows anything of matters connected with the Army must know that it will take a long time to turn them into efficient troops; and in no branch of the Army is the operation a slower or more difficult one than in that most important branch of the service, the Royal Artillery. It is true that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Westminster) spoke warmly—as he was well entitled to do—of the Volunteers. I have not one word to say against them; but I think the noble Marquess drew rather too highly coloured a picture when he said that they were all well armed. The noble Marquess's corps may be one of those that has had good arms served out to it; but that cannot be said of the whole body of the Volunteers.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMINSTER: I stated that they would be well armed in the spring.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: That is another thing, and I shall be as much rejoiced as my noble Friend when that is done; but at the present moment the whole body of Volunteers are not well armed, and I am certain that any measures for the purpose of rendering every portion of the Army efficient will receive the cordial support of the country. My Lords, in the paragraph relating to the national defences I was very much astonished at the total omission of one most important branch of our service. From the beginning of this Royal Speech to the end, I did not hear a single word with respect to the condition of the Navy. No one will venture to say that in England's insular position—with that "silver streak" which divides her from the Continent of Europe—her Navy is not a most important branch of her defences; and it eminently merits attention at the present moment, considering the changes that recent scientific discoveries have effected. Nobody can more sincerely regret than I do the serious illness under which the First Lord of the Admiralty has been and is now suffering; but I should like to know from the noble Earl opposite, and I am sure he will tell me, who is at the present moment responsible for the administration of the Navy? because the First Lord is absent; he has been suffering from illness for a long time, and, according to report, he is likely to suffer for a considerable period. I ask, then, who is responsible for the administration of the Navy; because it must be remembered that, from the peculiar constitution of the Navy, no Secretary of State can administer its affairs, inasmuch as the Board of Admiralty is a Board constituted by warrant, and no act in connection with the Board can be performed by any but those mentioned in the warrant. I will now ask the attention of your Lordships to that part of the Royal Speech relating to the Army—

That certainly, my Lords, is not one of the lessons which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in his mind when he addressed a large meeting in the North of Scotland, and I should be glad to know whether Her Majesty's Government—according to the Home Secretary, one of the most united Governments which ever held Office in this country—are of one mind on this subject, or whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is alone in his opinion as to the value and necessity of a standing army. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech made after receiving the freedom of the burgh of Elgin, said—

And this is the lesson the right hon. Gentleman draws from these circumstances—"I think I hear in this the knell of standing armies." Do the united Cabinet agree with the right hon. Gentleman that what has occurred on the Continent is the knell of standing armies, and that the lesson we have learnt is that standing armies are of no use? I am glad to find the Speech from the Throne firmer and more energetic—it is, I think, more in accordance with the feelings of the country than the speeches made during the Recess by Members of the Cabinet. How, indeed, when the Cabinet came together, they could afterwards reconcile their differences, and together compose such a speech as this, I do not know. However, this is their arrangement—I suppose I may call it a family arrangement. I find that other Members of the Government have given expression to views similar to those enunciated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There have not been many speeches by Cabinet Ministers during the Recess. The Prime Minister has, indeed, been accused of a reticence on the subject during the Recess not usual to him—creating a wrong impression in the minds of foreign nations, that there is no such country as this to be found on the map of Europe. It is true, indeed, that the Home Secretary has dispelled that illusion by saying to his constituents in Scotland—

"I am not one of those who can discover in the present state of things any such immediate or pressing danger to this country as would lead us suddenly to change our system or to rush into rash resolutions. Where lies the danger to England? When France was at once a great military and naval Power there undoubtedly existed a certain amount of danger. But where is the immediate danger now? Certainly not from France. She will have enough to do for many a year to come to repair the injury she has received from this war. Then, is it from Prussia? How is Prussia to transport her army here? How is she to reinforce it and supply it? It, therefore, seems to me that, while we should wisely turn to account the experience we have gained during the last weeks, time enough is before us to do so cautiously."

That, my Lords, is not the lesson drawn by the Chancellor of the Exchequer

that the knell of standing armies has been sounded. The right hon. Gentleman cautiously proceeds—

"I am of opinion that though Mr. Cardwell may be charged with proceeding slowly" (it is something that the right hon. Gentleman admits that the Minister for War has been slow) "in creating a great reserve force, he is justified by the circumstances in doing so."

Well, that, again, is not the view taken by the Government in the Speech from the Throne, for the paragraph relating to the Army concludes by promising that—

"No time will be lost in laying before you a Bill for the better regulation of the army and the auxiliary land forces of the Crown, and I hardly need commend it to your anxious and impartial consideration."

In reading over, therefore, this excessively long paragraph in this very long Speech, I am quite bewildered, for in their individual capacity the Members of this very united Cabinet say, and no doubt believe, one thing, while in their united capacity they put forward precisely opposite views. However that may be, I feel confident, my Lords, any measure which may be proposed to deal with the organization of the Army and to strengthen the national defences will receive from your Lordships patient and anxious consideration, in the hope that by adopting a really efficient measure this country may be enabled to take among the nations of the world the position it has always held, and which I trust it will continue to hold for centuries to come. I pass now to less exciting topics—I mean the various measures which Her Majesty's Government recommend us to deal with during the Session. They are not few in number, and certainly they are important in character. I should have thought, after the experience of the past Session, that the Government would not have been so generous in giving us so large a number of measures to deal with. Last year I recollect a late distinguished Member of the Cabinet expressing great doubt of their being able to carry the measures then proposed, and likening one of his Colleagues to a man who tries to drive six omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar. The undertaking of the Government accordingly proved to be impossible, for out of, I think, 13 measures proposed by them I doubt whether more than three passed this House—including the Irish Coercion Bill, which was an extra measure, not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I will not follow the noble Marquess who moved the Address (the Marquess of Westminster) in all his remarks upon these questions; but I am bound to notice one or two. The noble Marquess wondered why my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) did not move for a Committee on the University Tests Bill earlier in the Session. Why, because the Bill did not come up to us earlier in the Session. We were told that we ought to take the Bill on trust. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) thought differently, and as soon as he had an opportunity he moved for a Committee of Inquiry. As to the Ballot, or secret voting, I hope your Lordships may not have the opportunity of discussing such a measure, and I certainly shall not anticipate the discussion now. But with regard to Lord Palmerston's argument, that in voting an elector exercises a trust, I may point out that we have a population of 30,000,000, while the constituency is not above 2,000,000, so that the same argument still applies, notwithstanding the increased number of voters. I trust this will be remembered when we come to discuss the measure—if we ever do discuss it. The last paragraph in the Speech—one of great interest—relates to Ireland. When the Government took Office their watch-word was Retrenchment, and they were also going to pacify Ireland, assuming that they were the only body of Gentlemen who could pacify Ireland and make the people orderly and happy. They were to pass Bills dealing with the Church, with the land, and with the education of the people of Ireland. Well, no doubt they have disestablished and disendowed the Irish Church—I may almost say they have destroyed it—and last year they passed a Land Bill which has since been described by one of their own supporters as an Act transferring 70 millions of property from the pockets of the landlords, to whom it really belonged, into the pockets of the tenantry, to whom it never had belonged. I ask, has their policy with regard to Ireland realized the expectations held out to us? The Education Bill remains; but there is to be a lull in Irish legislation, and meanwhile we are told the country is in a satisfactory state. Now, I say that, notwithstanding all our legislation, Ireland is not in a satisfactory state; and on that point I can quote the opinion of a high authority—the Lord Lieutenant himself. While paying a visit to a noble Relative of mine opposite, the Lord Lieutenant was met in Mullingar by a body of gentlemen, who presented a highly complimentary address, expecting, no doubt, to receive a correspondingly cordial reception. But the Lord Lieutenant, on the contrary, told them exactly his opinion of the state of that part of the country. He said—

"I need not refer to the successful endeavours of Her Majesty's Government to carry out remedial measures for the benefit of Ireland; but I am bound to make some remarks, which I do with very great pain, on the state of this part of the country. While the whole of the country is realizing the benefits of a plentiful harvest and unusual material prosperity, and while good order and freedom from crime prevail generally throughout Ireland, this county, and a small district adjoining it, has been an unfortunate exception to the general rule. Within a very few weeks two most wanton murders have taken place, and other outrages have been committed which show that a barbarous and lawless spirit is still existing among some portion, at all events, of your population. Circumstances connected with these atrocious deeds clearly prove that they are not acts of personal revenge against the victim, but are the work of an organized and secret society."

And he goes on to say that if there was not an improvement on this state of things, other and more stringent measures will be adopted with respect to Ireland. Now, my Lords, I should like to know what those measures are, or whether any such measures are about to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. It seems, I may add, to be entirely forgotten in the Speech from the Throne, which, as I have said, is in the main contradicted by what fell from the Lord Lieutenant, that we are now ruling Ireland under one of the most stringent Coercion Acts which have ever been passed into law. It would, therefore, be very extraordinary if that country were not in a more peaceable condition than she was at the commencement of last Session—though I believe the statement which was made by the Lord Lieutenant to the deputation to which I have referred was most inaccurate. Have not, for instance, threatening letters been constantly sent to those who were engaged in carrying out the law under the provisions of the Act of Parliament? But there is another point to which I wish briefly to advert. We are told that the Education Bill for Ireland is to be postponed because that country stands in need of a lull after the violent agitation of the last two years. Now, I must say that the Government have, in my opinion, exercised in that respect a very wise discretion. But what are the measures that are to come after the lull? I think we can gather somewhat of the nature of those measures from a speech made the other day by one Member of the Government. Mr. Monsell, the new Postmaster General, in addressing his constituents at Rathkeale, in the county of Limerick, not very long ago, after having met with what seems to have been a very enthusiastic reception, stated that—

Now, it is, I think, unnecessary to enter into any details to show what the views are which are entertained in Ireland upon this question. We are all aware that a very eminent Prelate, Cardinal Cullen, holds particular views on the subject, and coupling those views with the statement of the Postmaster General, we may form some notion as to the system of primary education which they would like to see adopted, seeing that, in their opinion, it should be in accordance with Irish ideas. But Mr. Monsell went on to speak on other topics. We all know that the Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed, if not almost entirely destroyed, by recent legislation, and that a Land Bill was passed for Ireland which, even in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, was about as revolutionary a measure as has received the assent of Parliament for many years, and which we all thought would be a settlement of the question, at all events, for a long time to come. Mr. Monsell, however, intimated, while speaking in the highest terms of the Land Bill, “that it was the intention of the Government to supplement it by another measure in the course of a couple of years.” Now, I must express a hope that Mr. Monsell was inaccurate in making that statement, although holding, as he does, a high position in the Government, I do not suppose that he would venture to make it unless on what he deemed to be sufficient grounds. I trust, however, that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) will be able to-night to assure us that the statement is not quite in accordance with the intended policy of the Government, and that we are not to have another Land Bill in the course of two years' time. There is another subject connected with Ireland to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention. I have no doubt that a great many of your Lordships as well as myself have read with feelings of the greatest astonishment the decision which was lately arrived at with respect to the release of the Fenian prisoners, a great number of whom had been convicted by a jury of their countrymen, if not of treason itself, at all events of the crime of treason-felony, and some of whom had, if I mistake not, capital sentences passed upon them, although Her Majesty was graciously pleased to commute those sentences into transportation for life. One, if not more, of those, indeed, who were pardoned, was in reality something more than a political offender, inasmuch as he was implicated in the Clerkenwell explosion, or in the attack on the policemen at Manchester. But here, at all events, we have men who have been found guilty of treason-felony, and some of whom had capital sentences passed upon them, who have obtained their pardon, after having been imprisoned for about three years, on the condition that they gave their words not to come back to England or Ireland, and that is the mode in which the offence of treason-felony is dealt with by Her Majesty's Government. Why, my Lords, such a mode of proceeding seems to me to be nothing more nor less than holding out a premium to those who violate the laws of their country. And what is the result of this indulgence to the Fenian convicts? Why, the very next week one of the most important constituencies in Ireland returned to the British Parliament Mr. Martin, who is one of the strongest advocates for the repeal of the Union. The Government, however, were not satisfied with releasing the Fenians, and I would beg your Lordships' attention to what I am about to say, because the statement is so extraordinary that one can scarcely believe it to be true. That statement is that the Government, when those Fenians were released from prison, sent them out to America in one of the first-class steamers which ply between the two countries, and that each prisoner, in addition to a £5 note, received a suit of clothes. I fear, my Lords, a great many men who happen to be convicted of minor offences in this country, and who, having been imprisoned perhaps for robbing a hen roost, are obliged to beg their way from the place of their imprisonment to their homes, will think they have some cause for complaint under these circumstances, and why persons convicted of treason-felony should be treated better than such persons as those to whom I have just referred surpases, I confess, my comprehension. Such a course of policy can, I fear, only lead to the commission of renewed political offences. I have, I am afraid, too long occupied the time of your Lordships in touching on the various topics mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; and while I wish especially to guard myself from being supposed to approve in any way what the Government may have done, or may be about to do, I hope my noble Friend opposite will believe me when I say I sincerely and cordially concur in the adoption of the Address. I may add that I trust the deliberations of the present Session may be such as to convince the world that, however much we may differ on questions of domestic policy, we are all prepared to unite in supporting any measures and submitting to any sacrifices calculated to promote the dignity and to ensure the safety of our common country.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I shall not trespass on the time of your Lordships more than a very few minutes. After the speech which has just been made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) it would be very ungracious on my part not to acquiesce in the course advocated by my noble Friend at the beginning and end of his address—that we should not now enter into any angry debate, or any serious discussion of the more important topics mentioned in the gracious Speech from the Throne. But before touching on any question whatsoever, I wish to be allowed to repeat what the noble Duke has said as to the unusual excellence of the speeches of the Mover and Seconder of the Address. I thank them on behalf of the Government, and I trust they will permit me to compliment them on the admirable manner in which they have discharged their duties on this occasion. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) has complained much of the speeches which have been made by Mr. Bruce and some other Members of the Cabinet, and of those not made by Mr. Gladstone. Now, in replying to the remarks which have fallen from my noble Friend on that point, I must observe that I have been very busily engaged, and that I have not, therefore, been able to pay so much attention as perhaps I ought to have done to the speeches which have been delivered in different parts of the country during the Recess. But as to the speech of my right hon. Friend Mr. Bruce, I am perfectly sure that he never intended to express any feeling of exultation over the misfortunes of France:—if it were so, I, for one, cannot concur in that sentiment. I have been in a peculiar way, perhaps more so than any of your Lordships, connected with both France and Germany. I have close ties with both countries, and I have in both many intimate friends and connections. I have the greatest possible respect for the character of the Germans, and I shall never forget the kindness with which my family have for two generations been treated in France. Under such circumstances, your Lordships may easily conceive my personal feelings have been excited by the different phases the war has assumed in different manners; but once having been thought worthy to occupy the important Office I now hold in Her Majesty's Government, I have considered that in my dealing with both countries every personal feeling was to be absolutely put aside, and I have considered that my strict—and my only duty—was, with the assistance of my Colleagues, to carry out what we believed to be the wishes of the country in a fair and impartial, and I will add a cordial, neutrality, even though—as might naturally be expected—that neutrality might be deeply resented by both sides. I will now answer some of the questions put to me by the noble Duke. First of all, my noble Friend spoke of the Conference with respect to the Black Sea question, and seemed to complain that there was a want of explanation on the subject in the Speech from the Throne, and to be unable to understand how we got into the Conference with the consent of the co-signatories of the Treaty of 1856. The noble Duke alluded to the circular of Prince Gortchakoff, and my answer to it, and the official correspondence that ensued. While that correspondence was in progress a proposal was made by Prussia that the matter should be referred to a Conference, in order to arrive, if possible, at a peaceable solution of the question. My Lords, we thought it our duty, in conjunction with all our other Allies, to accept that Conference. We did not, however, accept it in the terms in which it was proposed—we could not consent that the Conference should be held at St. Petersburg:—but we did admit that it should be entered into provided it was done absolutely without any foregone conclusion; and the place of meeting was to be—not at our request, or by our selection, the selection was made by the whole of Europe—at London, as the most convenient to all. The noble Duke expressed surprise that all the Powers should have acquiesced in the Conference, and yet that France should not be represented at it. It was perfectly open to France to say—“This is not the time for such a Conference: I will have nothing to do with it, and will not be present at it.” But, as a matter of fact, she did not hold such language. She held with England that the Conference was a good thing in itself, and that it would be an advantage for France to be represented at it. But when the time came for sending over a representative difficulties arose, and on that account we postponed the meeting of the Conference week after week in order that the difficulty might, if possible, be overcome. France had a perfect right to select one for her representative who should be best adapted to state her views; but she did not, as the other Powers had done, select her representatives in London. M. Favre, the highest representative of the French Government, himself proposed to come; but up to this day—and I can perfectly understand the honourable reasons which have actuated his conduct—he has never been able to attend the Conference or to name a substitute. Now, the acquiescence of France in the Conference having been given, and the Conference having been summoned to settle in a peaceful way the question which had arisen with regard to the Black Sea, Turkey, the party most interested, though very desirous to have a French representative present, preferred, whatever might happen, that there should be no delay in proceeding with its deliberations; and as the Plenipotentiaries of all the other Powers—whether more friendly to Russia, to Germany, or to France—were ready to enter into friendly and amicable discussion, we were of opinion that, with the exception of giving some delay, it would be absolutely impossible that England alone should refuse to join in a Conference which had been summoned by unanimous consent. Accordingly we met. I cannot explain to you what has passed in the Conference, or what is likely to result from it, as it is not yet finished; but I think it is no indiscretion on my part to say that any arrangements we come to will be merely indications of what, in hope of the adhesion of France, we are prepared to embody in a Treaty to be signed some time after the conclusion of peace. I should like to add one word more. On the first day that we came into the Conference, we passed such resolutions with regard to the public law of Europe as placed me on a friendly footing with every Plenipotentiary present, and cleared the way for the consideration of such arrangements as might be best made by the Conference. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) also asked for some details, which it will not be improper for me to give, with respect to the difficult questions which exist between this country and the United States. Our proposal was simply this—that a joint Commission should be appointed by the two countries not to settle, but to consider the mode in which the different questions in dispute between the Dominion and the United States should be best placed in a way of settlement. The rejoinder to that proposal from the United States was that those claims also which are commonly, though, indeed, incorrectly, called “the Alabama claims”—claims which arose out of the great American War—should be referred to that Commission. We stipulated that in that case all the claims of British subjects should be so referred; and by common consent, in a spirit of mutual respect and friendly feeling, both claims being so referred, we had great pleasure in adopting the arrangement as compatible with the honour of both countries and the respect due from each to the other. We originally proposed that the Commission should consist of three members appointed by each country; but it being the desire of the President of the United States that there should be on each side five members, so as to represent all the different shades of opinion in that country, we concurred in that view. It may not be out of place to mention the members appointed on our side. They are my noble Colleague the Earl de Grey and Ripon, the Lord President of the Council, who, although he was only requested to take the post on Monday last, will leave Liverpool the day after tomorrow. He will be accompanied from this country by only one other Commissioner, a gentleman of great erudition on questions of International Law—Mr. Montague Bernard. They will be met in the United States by our other Commissioners, who will be our excellent diplomatic representative at Washington, Sir Edward Thornton, Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister of Canada, and, as we hope, Sir John Rose, whose knowledge of Canada and of the United States will make him a valuable member of the Commission. I am sure the noble Duke opposite will appreciate the value of his services. The Secretary will be a gentleman whose services in the same capacity to the Neutrality Laws Commission were found to be most useful—Lord Tenterden. As far as we at present know, the Commissioners of the United States will be Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, General Sohenck, their lately-appointed Minister to this country, ex-Judge Neilson, Mr. Williams, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and a gentleman who has lately been Attorney General in the United States. I can only express a hope that when your Lordships see the instructions drawn up for the guidance of our Commissioners, which it is impossible for us now to produce, you will say that, while framed in a friendly spirit, they contain nothing in the least derogatory from the honour of this country. My noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) alluded to an unfortunate vote taken in Congress the other day. I regret it. I think it is just one of those things that will probably be regretted in America itself by all who are most qualified to form an opinion. It seems to me, however, that we should not allow a vote of that kind to interfere with any negotiations for the settlement of the claims in question. Certainly this country would be a loser if we were once to admit the principle that international arrangements might be interfered with by foolish speeches made, or reckless votes now and then passed in the Legislature of either country. I do not know that there is any other question of importance with reference to Foreign Affairs to which I need allude. We shall lay on the Table all the Papers—some of them of the greatest interest and importance—and I have no doubt they will be considered and discussed in a fair spirit, and with that absolute freedom from party feelings which marks the debates on foreign affairs in this House. The noble Duke talked of the Army, and said he would not anticipate the measures which the Government were about to bring forward on the subject; but then he made one or two criticisms which were not quite correct. He complained that Mr. Cardwell, at the beginning of last year, disbanded 20,000 men merely to call them back again to the Army in the autumn.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I beg your pardon. I said that, as a matter of economy, it was more costly to disband 20,000 efficient troops, and then to enlist 20,000 recruits, than to keep the troops you had. I wanted to show that the economical plans of the Government would not prove so economical in the end.

EARL GRANVILLE: I hope the noble Duke will pay attention to the economical question, because, although it has not found a place in the Royal Speech to-day, Her Majesty's Government have not the slightest intention to ignore it; and though we think the augmentation of the Army will necessarily increase the Estimates, we hope, having regard to the increased number of men to be enlisted into the service, to effect economy by having regard to greater efficiency. When the noble Duke speaks of this reduction of men as a question of mere economy, I really can hardly understand his reasoning. We have brought a very large number of men into this country. Reductions were made, it is true, in the earlier part of the year; but afterwards a state of things arose as different as can be possibly imagined from what had so long existed. Europe was perfectly at peace when these reductions were made, and when this great war broke out we thought it necessary, not to an enormous extent, but to a certain degree, to add to the force of the Army in England. The noble Duke said we lost good men and supplied their places with less efficient ones; but I believe the reverse is actually the case, and that out of the 20,000 got rid of in the first instance many were entirely worn out, some had come from India, and others were bad characters—for, of course, every regiment got rid of their worst men and those whom it was most desirable to part with. By this time I hope the recruits who have been taken are equal, if not superior, to those whose places they fill up. Then the noble Duke made an attack upon us because the Volunteers are not well armed. To this I reply that they will be well armed with Snider rifles, of which 100,000—sufficient for two-thirds of the Volunteers—have been already furnished, and the rest will be furnished very shortly. With regard to the Admiralty, I think the noble Duke asked me who was responsible for the affairs of the Department during the absence of the First Lord. In reply to that I have to say that all the Estimates were prepared by Mr. Childers. Everything has been settled in the usual way, and the affairs of the Admiralty are conducted exactly in the same manner at this moment as they were on former occasions, when, for the sake of a holiday, or in consequence of temporary indisposition, the First Lord has been away. The next question was with regard to Ireland; and the noble Duke tried to diminish any feelings of satisfaction which we derive from the belief that certain remedial measures may have contributed to the general contentment of Ireland—although, no doubt, most painful exceptions exist in a very small part of Ireland—principally in Westmeath. As to what the noble Duke said of the recent release of the Fenian prisoners, I may remark that in no country have political offenders been looked upon exactly in the same light as habitual criminals; and there is another point to be considered—you must take into account the effect which severity of punishment always has in exciting sympathy for political offenders on the part of large masses of the community. As to the matters of detail referred to by the noble Duke, I am not acquainted with them. These persons, it should be remembered, had been four years in confinement, and if they were supplied with clothes that surely was not unreasonable. I may mention, too, that in all our well-regulated gaols the prisoners have the means of amassing a certain sum of money by their labour in the prison, and, consequently, they get a small sum to draw on their release. The noble Duke, in adverting to the different Bills mentioned in the Queen's Speech, very properly refrained from discussing them at any length, as they cannot be discussed in a satisfactory manner until your Lordships are acquainted with their provisions. I repeat, I think the noble Duke exercised sound judgment in abstaining from angry discussions on the first day of the Session, and I am much gratified at the graceful compliment he paid to Her Majesty, whom we were all so glad to see among us again—though, of course, I am aware of his warning, that we must not reckon on any lengthened armistice with regard to what we have done or are going to do in the present Session.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that one of the most important topics which could engage the attention of Parliament was the condition of the Navy. It was only by her Navy that this country could be defended, and it was of the utmost importance that the Navy should be maintained in a state of thorough efficiency. We ought to have a perfect service for the transport of troops on any sudden emergency, and especial care should be taken that all our coal depôts should be well defended, for coals formed the strength of modern navies. These were important subjects, which demanded the most careful consideration at the hands of their Lordships and of Her Majesty's Government.

Address agreed to, nemine dissentiente, and ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THIS HOUSE.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise with very great pleasure to make a Motion which I have made for now a considerable number of years following, although I am sorry to say the pleasure is not at the present moment altogether unmixed. Your Lordships are aware that Lord Redesdale has been very seriously indisposed; but I have had a communication from him this afternoon which is of a more favourable character. I am sure that the proposition I have

Well, in that case, and if the right hon. Gentleman was the mouthpiece of the views of the English Cabinet, and if they all regard France as a burglar who deserved to be thrown out of window, I think that the cordiality of our relations with that country was cherished by the English Government in a manner peculiarly their own, and little likely to be appreciated by the French nation. I, for one, shall very much rejoice if Her Majesty's Government should be able to prove to us and the country that they have done all in their power to act between these two great countries in a manner befitting that character of neutrality which they professed to sustain—and which the country has endorsed—in regard to the operations on the Continent. No doubt during the last few days affairs appear to have taken a more favourable turn, giving a somewhat better hope of a peaceful solution of these difficulties. We must all be anxious in the interests of the nations that the result should be peace, and that the peace should be of a lasting character; but it must not be forgotten that it will be very difficult to make any peace lasting unless there be a strong Government in France, which may be able to induce the people to agree to what must, under the circumstances of the present case, be most harassing, distressing, and annoying to their feelings.

I pass over several paragraphs till I come to one of great importance in relation to the position of this country and the despatch of Prince Gortchakoff. It is perfectly true that in the Speech there is—perhaps intentionally—no absolute mention of the despatch of Prince Gortchakoff, or of the answer that was made to it by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville); but there can be no doubt that in the paragraph to which I refer that despatch is alluded to. Her Majesty says—

"I have endeavoured, in correspondence with other Powers of Europe, to uphold the sanctity of Treaties, and to remove any misapprehension as to the binding character of their obligations."

We all know that Prince Gortchakoff wrote a despatch of a most startling character; the noble Earl wrote an answer to it; and the country naturally

are very much alive to what is going on, and very anxious to know what the result will be. The whole appears to have collapsed, I may say, into a Conference. The Conference is to assemble, but we are not told how. We are told—

Now, is that an accurate statement of fact? I rather think it is not, because the next paragraph goes on to say—

"I greatly regret that my earnest efforts have failed to procure the presence at the Conference of any Representative of France, which was one of the chief parties to the Treaty of 1856, and which must ever be regarded as a principal and indispensable member of the great Commonwealth of Europe."

Therefore, a Conference was to be held to discuss this despatch written by Prince Gortchakoff, and the Treaty of 1856, to which France was one of the chief parties. Yet France was not present. First we are told that the Conference is agreed to by the Powers which were parties to the Treaty of 1856, and then we are told that France had nothing on earth to do with it. That is a difference in terms which I cannot reconcile. I want to know where was the necessity for hurrying on the Conference if—as I quite agree—it was absolutely necessary that France should be represented at it? Your Lordships will also examine the Papers, when they are submitted to you, with great interest to learn what steps have been taken to assure the result being binding on Russia, if the Conference comes to any decision on the subjects to be submitted to it. That is a most important point, to which we shall be better able to address ourselves when we come to consider the Papers which are to be laid on the Table. I now come to that paragraph of the Speech which relates to America, and again I find myself under the necessity of questioning the strict accuracy of the statement. About the middle of the paragraph it is stated—

"In order to determine the most convenient mode of treatment for these matters, I have suggested the appointment of a joint Commission."

There we are told that a joint Commission is suggested, and in the next line we are told that—

the consideration of the American claims growing out of the circumstances of the late war."

Therefore I conclude that as this suggestion has been accepted, the appointment of the Commission may be considered un fait accompli. I hope that we shall soon hear exactly what the terms are on which the Commission will be authorized to act. Are they to include all the claims that have been or may be made by one Government upon the other? If so, that would be equivalent to an inquiry into the whole of what are commonly called "the Alabama claims;" and I should like to know whether it is to be upon the bases agreed on by the late Lord Derby, and if they are different, why that difference had been made, and what circumstances have arisen to call for it? Upon all these points we require more information. The next paragraph is a rather remarkable one. It refers to the unhappy murder of Englishmen in Greece, and states that the inquiry instituted by the Greek Government has not, "unhappily, arrived at a termination answerable in all respects to My just expectations." Now, I believe the only result of that inquiry has been the incarceration of an Englishman, and that upon application being made for his release, the Greek Government replied that the law must take its course. I therefore cannot but think that, so far as that affair is concerned, the inquiry has not had any very satisfactory consequence. Her Majesty then states in her Speech—

That is a declaration which I rejoiced to hear; but, taking a view of the state of things all around, I must think that, to say the least, that is a somewhat exaggerated statement. The next paragraph in the Royal Speech to which I shall call attention is one relating to the Revenue, and in which Her Majesty states—"The Estimates for the coming year will be promptly laid before you." Now, I wish to call attention to a very remarkable omission in this paragraph. It is rather a singular circumstance, seeing that on scarcely any former occasion—and certainly never in a Speech made during the Administration of a Cabinet whose watch-word is Retrenchment and Economy, has there been such an omission. I allude to the fact that there is no mention made that the Estimates have been framed with a due regard to economy. It may be that the Government are beginning to see the error of their ways, and that the doctrine of retrenchment as interpreted by them is one which can never be successfully carried out by any Government. With regard to the Civil Service, we all know how retrenchment has been carried out in that branch—the Departments were supposed to be overstocked with clerks, and they were reduced accordingly, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets credit for the great decrease of expenditure. Now, what is the opinion of the Home Minister as to the conduct of public business? He has stated in his speech—

The administrative work of all the Departments had been enormously added to; the number of Ministers had not been increased, while the business of their offices had been greatly augmented, and that was a state of things which, unless some remedy was applied, would result in a position of great difficulty."

If that statement were correct, why had there been all that recent casting off of clerks? The observation seems rather to imply that more clerks, and perhaps more Ministers, were necessary; and at any rate, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own showing, a position of great difficulty may be looked for. Is that a proof of the wisdom of indiscriminate retrenchment, carried out to satisfy a cry rather than from any real necessity? The only result will be, that in the end you will have to increase the offices again by the addition of more clerks. My Lords—I next come to that very important portion of the Speech which refers to the subject of the national defences. I am not going to enter into any prophecy as to what the measures of the Government will be, or as to what would be, in my opinion, the most desirable method of proceeding; but of this I am certain, that judging from everything one hears of, and is able to gather respecting the opinion of the country, that it will not be satisfied unless the Government is prepared to deal with the subject in a comprehensive manner, so as to put the country in a position that will make it prepared for any present emergency, or for any difficulty that may arise in the future; and I am certain that any scheme that will put an end to such alternative fits between parsimony and extravagance as we have lately witnessed will receive the unanimous support of the country. I read in the paper the other day a letter written by a noble Earl (Earl Russell), in which he says that "Mr. Cardwell's mission was to retrench." Well, that is no doubt true. The right hon. Gentleman came into Office with the avowed object of retrenchment, and one of the first things he did was to cut off 20,000 men from the Army, and I presume about £2,000,000 from the expenditure. Well, but what took place at the end of last Session? Why, Mr. Cardwell had to put on 20,000 men. I should like to ask him, if I had the opportunity, and as I have not I will ask the noble Earl opposite, whether the putting on of 20,000 men did not cost much more than the taking off of them saved; and, moreover, whether the 20,000 men so put on were not a much worse and more useless article than those who had been taken off? The 20,000 men added to the Army at the end of last Session must be raw recruits, and anyone who knows anything of matters connected with the Army must know that it will take a long time to turn them into efficient troops; and in no branch of the Army is the operation a slower or more difficult one than in that most important branch of the service, the Royal Artillery. It is true that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Westminster) spoke warmly—as he was well entitled to do—of the Volunteers. I have not one word to say against them; but I think the noble Marquess drew rather too highly coloured a picture when he said that they were all well armed. The noble Marquess's corps may be one of those that has had good arms served out to it; but that cannot be said of the whole body of the Volunteers.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMINSTER: I stated that they would be well armed in the spring.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: That is another thing, and I shall be as much rejoiced as my noble Friend when that is done; but at the present moment the whole body of Volunteers are not well armed, and I am certain that any measures for the purpose of rendering every portion of the Army efficient will receive the cordial support of the country. My Lords, in the paragraph relating to the national defences I was very much astonished at the total omission of one most important branch of our service. From the beginning of this Royal Speech to the end, I did not hear a single word with respect to the condition of the Navy. No one will venture to say that in England's insular position—with that "silver streak" which divides her from the Continent of Europe—her Navy is not a most important branch of her defences; and it eminently merits attention at the present moment, considering the changes that recent scientific discoveries have effected. Nobody can more sincerely regret than I do the serious illness under which the First Lord of the Admiralty has been and is now suffering; but I should like to know from the noble Earl opposite, and I am sure he will tell me, who is at the present moment responsible for the administration of the Navy? because the First Lord is absent; he has been suffering from illness for a long time, and, according to report, he is likely to suffer for a considerable period. I ask, then, who is responsible for the administration of the Navy; because it must be remembered that, from the peculiar constitution of the Navy, no Secretary of State can administer its affairs, inasmuch as the Board of Admiralty is a Board constituted by warrant, and no act in connection with the Board can be performed by any but those mentioned in the warrant. I will now ask the attention of your Lordships to that part of the Royal Speech relating to the Army—

That certainly, my Lords, is not one of the lessons which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in his mind when he addressed a large meeting in the North of Scotland, and I should be glad to know whether Her Majesty's Government—according to the Home Secretary, one of the most united Governments which ever held Office in this country—are of one mind on this subject, or whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is alone in his opinion as to the value and necessity of a standing army. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech made after receiving the freedom of the burgh of Elgin, said—

And this is the lesson the right hon. Gentleman draws from these circumstances—"I think I hear in this the knell of standing armies." Do the united Cabinet agree with the right hon. Gentleman that what has occurred on the Continent is the knell of standing armies, and that the lesson we have learnt is that standing armies are of no use? I am glad to find the Speech from the Throne firmer and more energetic—it is, I think, more in accordance with the feelings of the country than the speeches made during the Recess by Members of the Cabinet. How, indeed, when the Cabinet came together, they could afterwards reconcile their differences, and together compose such a speech as this, I do not know. However, this is their arrangement—I suppose I may call it a family arrangement. I find that other Members of the Government have given expression to views similar to those enunciated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There have not been many speeches by Cabinet Ministers during the Recess. The Prime Minister has, indeed, been accused of a reticence on the subject during the Recess not usual to him—creating a wrong impression in the minds of foreign nations, that there is no such country as this to be found on the map of Europe. It is true, indeed, that the Home Secretary has dispelled that illusion by saying to his constituents in Scotland—

"I am not one of those who can discover in the present state of things any such immediate or pressing danger to this country as would lead us suddenly to change our system or to rush into rash resolutions. Where lies the danger to England? When France was at once a great military and naval Power there undoubtedly existed a certain amount of danger. But where is the immediate danger now? Certainly not from France. She will have enough to do for many a year to come to repair the injury she has received from this war. Then, is it from Prussia? How is Prussia to transport her army here? How is she to reinforce it and supply it? It, therefore, seems to me that, while we should wisely turn to account the experience we have gained during the last weeks, time enough is before us to do so cautiously."

that the knell of standing armies has been sounded. The right hon. Gentleman cautiously proceeds—

"I am of opinion that though Mr. Cardwell may be charged with proceeding slowly" (it is something that the right hon. Gentleman admits that the Minister for War has been slow) "in creating a great reserve force, he is justified by the circumstances in doing so."

Well, that, again, is not the view taken by the Government in the Speech from the Throne, for the paragraph relating to the Army concludes by promising that—

"No time will be lost in laying before you a Bill for the better regulation of the army and the auxiliary land forces of the Crown, and I hardly need commend it to your anxious and impartial consideration."

In reading over, therefore, this excessively long paragraph in this very long Speech, I am quite bewildered, for in their individual capacity the Members of this very united Cabinet say, and no doubt believe, one thing, while in their united capacity they put forward precisely opposite views. However that may be, I feel confident, my Lords, any measure which may be proposed to deal with the organization of the Army and to strengthen the national defences will receive from your Lordships patient and anxious consideration, in the hope that by adopting a really efficient measure this country may be enabled to take among the nations of the world the position it has always held, and which I trust it will continue to hold for centuries to come. I pass now to less exciting topics—I mean the various measures which Her Majesty's Government recommend us to deal with during the Session. They are not few in number, and certainly they are important in character. I should have thought, after the experience of the past Session, that the Government would not have been so generous in giving us so large a number of measures to deal with. Last year I recollect a late distinguished Member of the Cabinet expressing great doubt of their being able to carry the measures then proposed, and likening one of his Colleagues to a man who tries to drive six omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar. The undertaking of the Government accordingly proved to be impossible, for out of, I think, 13 measures proposed by them I doubt whether more than three passed this House—including the Irish Coercion Bill, which was an extra measure, not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I will not follow the noble Marquess who moved the Address (the Marquess of Westminster) in all his remarks upon these questions; but I am bound to notice one or two. The noble Marquess wondered why my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) did not move for a Committee on the University Tests Bill earlier in the Session. Why, because the Bill did not come up to us earlier in the Session. We were told that we ought to take the Bill on trust. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) thought differently, and as soon as he had an opportunity he moved for a Committee of Inquiry. As to the Ballot, or secret voting, I hope your Lordships may not have the opportunity of discussing such a measure, and I certainly shall not anticipate the discussion now. But with regard to Lord Palmerston's argument, that in voting an elector exercises a trust, I may point out that we have a population of 30,000,000, while the constituency is not above 2,000,000, so that the same argument still applies, notwithstanding the increased number of voters. I trust this will be remembered when we come to discuss the measure—if we ever do discuss it. The last paragraph in the Speech—one of great interest—relates to Ireland. When the Government took Office their watch-word was Retrenchment, and they were also going to pacify Ireland, assuming that they were the only body of Gentlemen who could pacify Ireland and make the people orderly and happy. They were to pass Bills dealing with the Church, with the land, and with the education of the people of Ireland. Well, no doubt they have disestablished and disendowed the Irish Church—I may almost say they have destroyed it—and last year they passed a Land Bill which has since been described by one of their own supporters as an Act transferring 70 millions of property from the pockets of the landlords, to whom it really belonged, into the pockets of the tenantry, to whom it never had belonged. I ask, has their policy with regard to Ireland realized the expectations held out to us? The Education Bill remains; but there is to be a lull in Irish legislation, and meanwhile we are told the country is in a satisfactory state. Now, I say that, notwithstanding all our legislation, Ireland is not in a satisfactory state; and on that point I can quote the opinion of a high authority—the Lord Lieutenant himself. While paying a visit to a noble Relative of mine opposite, the Lord Lieutenant was met in Mullingar by a body of gentlemen, who presented a highly complimentary address, expecting, no doubt, to receive a correspondingly cordial reception. But the Lord Lieutenant, on the contrary, told them exactly his opinion of the state of that part of the country. He said—

And he goes on to say that if there was not an improvement on this state of things, other and more stringent measures will be adopted with respect to Ireland. Now, my Lords, I should like to know what those measures are, or whether any such measures are about to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. It seems, I may add, to be entirely forgotten in the Speech from the Throne, which, as I have said, is in the main contradicted by what fell from the Lord Lieutenant, that we are now ruling Ireland under one of the most stringent Coercion Acts which have ever been passed into law. It would, therefore, be very extraordinary if that country were not in a more peaceable condition than she was at the commencement of last Session—though I believe the statement which was made by the Lord Lieutenant to the deputation to which I have referred was most inaccurate. Have not, for instance, threatening letters been constantly sent to those who were engaged in carrying out the law under the provisions of the Act of Parliament? But there is another point to which I wish briefly to advert. We are told that the Education Bill for Ireland is to be postponed because that country stands in need of a lull after the violent agitation of the last two years. Now, I must say that the Government have, in my opinion, exercised in that respect a very wise discretion. But what are the measures that are to come after the lull? I think we can gather somewhat of the nature of those measures from a speech made the other day by one Member of the Government. Mr. Monsell, the new Postmaster General, in addressing his constituents at Rathkeale, in the county of Limerick, not very long ago, after having met with what seems to have been a very enthusiastic reception, stated that—

Now, it is, I think, unnecessary to enter into any details to show what the views are which are entertained in Ireland upon this question. We are all aware that a very eminent Prelate, Cardinal Cullen, holds particular views on the subject, and coupling those views with the statement of the Postmaster General, we may form some notion as to the system of primary education which they would like to see adopted, seeing that, in their opinion, it should be in accordance with Irish ideas. But Mr. Monsell went on to speak on other topics. We all know that the Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed, if not almost entirely destroyed, by recent legislation, and that a Land Bill was passed for Ireland which, even in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, was about as revolutionary a measure as has received the assent of Parliament for many years, and which we all thought would be a settlement of the question, at all events, for a long time to come. Mr. Monsell, however, intimated, while speaking in the highest terms of the Land Bill, “that it was the intention of the Government to supplement it by another measure in the course of a couple of years.” Now, I must express a hope that Mr. Monsell was inaccurate in making that statement, although holding, as he does, a high position in the Government, I do not suppose that he would venture to make it unless on what he deemed to be sufficient grounds. I trust, however, that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) will be able to-night to assure us that the statement is not quite in accordance with the intended policy of the Government, and that we are not to have another Land Bill in the course of two years' time. There is another subject connected with Ireland to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention. I have no doubt that a great many of your Lordships as well as myself have read with feelings of the greatest astonishment the decision which was lately arrived at with respect to the release of the Fenian prisoners, a great number of whom had been convicted by a jury of their countrymen, if not of treason itself, at all events of the crime of treason-felony, and some of whom had, if I mistake not, capital sentences passed upon them, although Her Majesty was graciously pleased to commute those sentences into transportation for life. One, if not more, of those, indeed, who were pardoned, was in reality something more than a political offender, inasmuch as he was implicated in the Clerkenwell explosion, or in the attack on the policemen at Manchester. But here, at all events, we have men who have been found guilty of treason-felony, and some of whom had capital sentences passed upon them, who have obtained their pardon, after having been imprisoned for about three years, on the condition that they gave their words not to come back to England or Ireland, and that is the mode in which the offence of treason-felony is dealt with by Her Majesty's Government. Why, my Lords, such a mode of proceeding seems to me to be nothing more nor less than holding out a premium to those who violate the laws of their country. And what is the result of this indulgence to the Fenian convicts? Why, the very next week one of the most important constituencies in Ireland returned to the British Parliament Mr. Martin, who is one of the strongest advocates for the repeal of the Union. The Government, however, were not satisfied with releasing the Fenians, and I would beg your Lordships' attention to what I am about to say, because the statement is so extraordinary that one can scarcely believe it to be true. That statement is that the Government, when those Fenians were released from prison, sent them out to America in one of the first-class steamers which ply between the two countries, and that each prisoner, in addition to a £5 note, received a suit of clothes. I fear, my Lords, a great many men who happen to be convicted of minor offences in this country, and who, having been imprisoned perhaps for robbing a hen roost, are obliged to beg their way from the place of their imprisonment to their homes, will think they have some cause for complaint under these circumstances, and why persons convicted of treason-felony should be treated better than such persons as those to whom I have just referred surpasses, I confess, my comprehension. Such a course of policy can, I fear, only lead to the commission of renewed political offences. I have, I am afraid, too long occupied the time of your Lordships in touching on the various topics mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; and while I wish especially to guard myself from being supposed to approve in any way what the Government may have done, or may be about to do, I hope my noble Friend opposite will believe me when I say I sincerely and cordially concur in the adoption of the Address. I may add that I trust the deliberations of the present Session may be such as to convince the world that, however much we may differ on questions of domestic policy, we are all prepared to unite in supporting any measures and submitting to any sacrifices calculated to promote the dignity and to ensure the safety of our common country.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I shall not trespass on the time of your Lordships more than a very few minutes. After the speech which has just been made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) it would be very ungracious on my part not to acquiesce in the course advocated by my noble Friend at the beginning and end of his address—that we should not now enter into any angry debate, or any serious discussion of the more important topics mentioned in the gracious Speech from the Throne. But before touching on any question whatsoever, I wish to be allowed to repeat what the noble Duke has said as to the unusual excellence of the speeches of the Mover and Seconder of the Address. I thank them on behalf of the Government, and I trust they will permit me to compliment them on the admirable manner in which they have discharged their duties on this occasion. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) has complained much of the speeches which have been made by Mr. Bruce and some other Members of the Cabinet, and of those not made by Mr. G. Now, in replying to the remarks which have fallen from my noble Friend, at that point, I must observe that I have been very busily engaged, and have not, therefore, been able to pay much attention as perhaps I should have done to the speeches which have been delivered in different parts of the country during the Recess. But I am perfectly sure that he never intended to express any feeling of exultation at the misfortunes of France:—if it were so, I, for one, cannot concur in that sentiment. I have been in a peculiarly anxious state of mind, perhaps more so than any of your Lordships, connected with both France and Germany. I have close ties with both countries, and I have in both many intimate friends and connections. I have the greatest possible respect for the character of the Germans, and I never forget the kindness with which my family have for two generations been treated in France. Under such circumstances, your Lordships may easily conceive my personal feelings have been excited by the different phases through which France has assumed in different manners, and I have once having been thought worthy to occupy the important Office I now hold in Her Majesty's Government, I have considered that in my dealing with France and the countries every personal feeling would be absolutely put aside, and I have considered that my strict—and my only duty—was, with the assistance of my colleagues, to carry out what we believed to be the wishes of the country in a fair and impartial, and I will add a complete neutrality, even though—as might naturally be expected—that neutrality might be deeply resented by both France and Germany. I will now answer some of the questions put to me by the noble Duke. In all, my noble Friend spoke of the difference with respect to the Black Sea question, and seemed to complain that there was a want of explanation on the subject in the Speech from the Throne, and to be unable to understand how we got into the Conference with the co-signatories of the Treaty of 1856. The noble Duke alluded to a circular of Prince Gortchakoff in answer to it, and the official correspondence that ensued. A proposal was made by Prussia matter should be referred to a Conference, in order to arrive, if possible, at a peaceable solution of the question. My Lords, we thought it our duty, in conjunction with all our other Allies, to accept that Conference. We did not, however, accept it in the terms in which it was proposed—we could not consent that the Conference should be held at St. Petersburg:—but we did admit that it should be entered into provided it was done absolutely without any foregone conclusion; and the place of meeting was to be—not at our request, or by our selection, the selection was made by the whole of Europe—at London, as the most convenient to all. The noble Duke expressed surprise that all the Powers should have acquiesced in the Conference, and yet that France should not be represented at it. It was perfectly open to France to say—“This is not the time for such a Conference: I will have nothing to do with it, and will not be present at it.” But, as a matter of fact, she did not hold such language. She held with England that the Conference was a good thing in itself, and that it would be an advantage for France to be represented at it. But when the time came for sending over a representative difficulties arose, and on that account we postponed the meeting of the Conference week after week in order that the difficulty might, if possible, be overcome. France had a perfect right to select one for her representative who should be best adapted to state her views; but she did not, as the other Powers had done, select her representatives in London. M. Favre, the highest representative of the French Government, himself proposed to come; but up to this day—and I can perfectly understand the honourable reasons which have actuated his conduct—he has never been able to attend the Conference or to name a substitute. Now, the acquiescence of France in the Conference having been given, and the Conference having been summoned to settle in a peaceful way the question which had arisen with regard to the Black Sea, Turkey, the party most interested, though very desirous to have a French representative present, preferred, whatever might happen, that there should be no delay in proceeding with its deliberations; and as the Plenipotentiaries of all the other Powers—whether more friendly

to Russia, to Germany, or to France—were ready to enter into friendly and amicable discussion, we were of opinion that, with the exception of giving some delay, it would be absolutely impossible that England alone should refuse to join in a Conference which had been summoned by unanimous consent. Accordingly we met. I cannot explain to you what has passed in the Conference, or what is likely to result from it, as it is not yet finished; but I think it is no indiscretion on my part to say that any arrangements we come to will be merely indications of what, in hope of the adhesion of France, we are prepared to embody in a Treaty to be signed some time after the conclusion of peace. I should like to add one word more. On the first day that we came into the Conference, we passed such resolutions with regard to the public law of Europe as placed me on a friendly footing with every Plenipotentiary present, and cleared the way for the consideration of such arrangements as might be best made by the Conference. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) also asked for some details, which it will not be improper for me to give, with respect to the difficult questions which exist between this country and the United States. Our proposal was simply this—that a joint Commission should be appointed by the two countries not to settle, but to consider the mode in which the different questions in dispute between the Dominion and the United States should be best placed in a way of settlement. The rejoinder to that proposal from the United States was that those claims also which are commonly, though, indeed, incorrectly, called “the Alabama claims”—claims which arose out of the great American War—should be referred to that Commission. We stipulated that in that case all the claims of British subjects should be so referred; and by common consent, in a spirit of mutual respect and friendly feeling, both claims being so referred, we had great pleasure in adopting the arrangement as compatible with the honour of both countries and the respect due from each to the other. We originally proposed that the Commission should consist of three members appointed by each country; but it being the desire of the President of the United States that there should be on each side five members, so as to represent all the different shades of opinion in that country, we concurred in that view. It may not be out of place to mention the members appointed on our side. They are my noble Colleague the Earl de Grey and Ripon, the Lord President of the Council, who, although he was only requested to take the post on Monday last, will leave Liverpool the day after tomorrow. He will be accompanied from this country by only one other Commissioner, a gentleman of great erudition on questions of International Law—Mr. Montague Bernard. They will be met in the United States by our other Commissioners, who will be our excellent diplomatic representative at Washington, Sir Edward Thornton, Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister of Canada, and, as we hope, Sir John Rose, whose knowledge of Canada and of the United States will make him a valuable member of the Commission. I am sure the noble Duke opposite will appreciate the value of his services. The Secretary will be a gentleman whose services in the same capacity to the Neutrality Laws Commission were found to be most useful—Lord Tenterden. As far as we at present know, the Commissioners of the United States will be Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, General Schenck, their lately-appointed Minister to this country, ex-Judge Neilson, Mr. Williams, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and a gentleman who has lately been Attorney General in the United States. I can only express a hope that when your Lordships see the instructions drawn up for the guidance of our Commissioners, which it is impossible for us now to produce, you will say that, while framed in a friendly spirit, they contain nothing in the least derogatory from the honour of this country. My noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) alluded to an unfortunate vote taken in Congress the other day. I regret it. I think it is just one of those things that will probably be regretted in America itself by all who are most qualified to form an opinion. It seems to me, however, that we should not allow a vote of that kind to interfere with any negotiations for the settlement of the claims in question. Certainly this country would be a loser if we were once to admit the principle that international arrangements might be interfered with by foolish speeches made, or reckless votes now and then passed in the Legislature of either country. I do not know that there is any other question of importance with reference to Foreign Affairs to which I need allude. We shall lay on the Table all the Papers—some of them of the greatest interest and importance—and I have no doubt they will be considered and discussed in a fair spirit, and with that absolute freedom from party feelings which marks the debates on foreign affairs in this House. The noble Duke talked of the Army, and said he would not anticipate the measures which the Government were about to bring forward on the subject; but then he made one or two criticisms which were not quite correct. He complained that Mr. Cardwell, at the beginning of last year, disbanded 20,000 men merely to call them back again to the Army in the autumn.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I beg your pardon. I said that, as a matter of economy, it was more costly to disband 20,000 efficient troops, and then to enlist 20,000 recruits, than to keep the troops you had. I wanted to show that the economical plans of the Government would not prove so economical in the end.

EARL GRANVILLE: I hope the noble Duke will pay attention to the economical question, because, although it has not found a place in the Royal Speech to-day, Her Majesty's Government have not the slightest intention to ignore it; and though we think the augmentation of the Army will necessarily increase the Estimates, we hope, having regard to the increased number of men to be enlisted into the service, to effect economy by having regard to greater efficiency. When the noble Duke speaks of this reduction of men as a question of mere economy, I really can hardly understand his reasoning. We have brought a very large number of men into this country. Reductions were made, it is true, in the earlier part of the year; but afterwards a state of things arose as different as can be possibly imagined from what had so long existed. Europe was perfectly at peace when these reductions were made, and when this great war broke out we thought it necessary, not to an enormous extent, but to a certain degree, to add to the force of the Army in England. The noble Duke said we lost good men and supplied their places with less efficient ones; but I believe the reverse is actually the case, and that out of the 20,000 got rid of in the first instance many were entirely worn out, some had come from India, and others were bad characters—for, of course, every regiment got rid of their worst men and those whom it was most desirable to part with. By this time I hope the recruits who have been taken are equal, if not superior, to those whose places they fill up. Then the noble Duke made an attack upon us because the Volunteers are not well armed. To this I reply that they will be well armed with Snider rifles, of which 100,000—sufficient for two-thirds of the Volunteers—have been already furnished, and the rest will be furnished very shortly. With regard to the Admiralty, I think the noble Duke asked me who was responsible for the affairs of the Department during the absence of the First Lord. In reply to that I have to say that all the Estimates were prepared by Mr. Childers. Everything has been settled in the usual way, and the affairs of the Admiralty are conducted exactly in the same manner at this moment as they were on former occasions, when, for the sake of a holiday, or in consequence of temporary indisposition, the First Lord has been away. The next question was with regard to Ireland; and the noble Duke tried to diminish any feelings of satisfaction which we derive from the belief that certain remedial measures may have contributed to the general contentment of Ireland—although, no doubt, most painful exceptions exist in a very small part of Ireland—principally in Westmeath. As to what the noble Duke said of the recent release of the Fenian prisoners, I may remark that in no country have political offenders been looked upon exactly in the same light as habitual criminals; and there is another point to be considered—you must take into account the effect which severity of punishment always has in exciting sympathy for political offenders on the part of large masses of the community. As to the matters of detail referred to by the noble Duke, I am not acquainted with them. These persons, it should be remembered, had been four years in confinement, and if they were supplied with clothes that surely was not unreasonable. I may mention, too, that in all our well-regulated gaols the prisoners have the means of amassing a certain sum of money by their labour in the prison, and, consequently, they get a small sum to draw on their release. The noble Duke, in adverting to the different Bills mentioned in the Queen's Speech, very properly refrained from discussing them at any length, as they cannot be discussed in a satisfactory manner until your Lordships are acquainted with their provisions. I repeat, I think the noble Duke exercised sound judgment in abstaining from angry discussions on the first day of the Session, and I am much gratified at the graceful compliment he paid to Her Majesty, whom we were all so glad to see among us again—though, of course, I am aware of his warning, that we must not reckon on any lengthened armistice with regard to what we have done or are going to do in the present Session.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that one of the most important topics which could engage the attention of Parliament was the condition of the Navy. It was only by her Navy that this country could be defended, and it was of the utmost importance that the Navy should be maintained in a state of thorough efficiency. We ought to have a perfect service for the transport of troops on any sudden emergency, and especial care should be taken that all our coal depôts should be well defended, for coals formed the strength of modern navies. These were important subjects, which demanded the most careful consideration at the hands of their Lordships and of Her Majesty's Government.

Address agreed to, nemine dissente, and ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THIS HOUSE.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise with very great pleasure to make a Motion which I have made for now a considerable number of years following, although I am sorry to say the pleasure is not at the present moment altogether unmixed. Your Lordships are aware that Lord Redesdale has been very seriously indisposed; but I have had a communication from him this afternoon which is of a more favourable character. I am sure that the proposition I have to make for the re-appointment of so esteemed a Member of this House, who has so ably performed the duties of Chairman of Committees, will be at once agreed to.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I have very great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the noble Earl. I am glad to hear that my noble Friend is so much better, and I hope before long he will be able to fill the Chair with the same ability which has hitherto so much distinguished him.

Appointed, nomine dissidente, to take the chair in all Committees of this House for this Session.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That this House has, this day, attended Her Majesty in the House of Peers, when Her Majesty was pleased to make, by Her Chancellor, a most gracious Speech from the Throne to both Houses of Parliament; of which, Mr. Speaker said, he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a Copy:—

And Mr. SPEAKER read it to the House.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

MR. J. G. C. HAMILTON: Mr. Speaker—Sir, the House must, I am sure, be impatient to hear the great events which have happened in Europe since it last met, and their effect on the policy of this country, discussed by those in whose opinions it is in the habit of placing confidence. I can only suppose that it is a wish to pay a compliment to the country to which I belong, and the constituency which I represent, which has led to my being entrusted with my present honourable duty. In fulfilling that duty, I feel that I have every reason to appeal to the forbearance which the House always shows to those who are not in the habit of addressing it.

In proposing that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in answer to the gracious Speech which she has been pleased this day to deliver from the Throne, I am sure I express the feeling of this House when I say that the presence of Her Majesty in person has been a great gratification to Her Parliament and people, and has added lustre to the opening of our Session.

The announcement which Her Majesty has been pleased to make of the approaching marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise must have been received by this House with the deepest interest, as it is an alliance so likely to promote the happiness of one of the Royal Family, and bind it still more closely to the hearts of the people. The presence of members of the Royal House in these islands can but add to the loyalty of their inhabitants; and I think we, for our part, have every reason to congratulate ourselves when they have no home but this country, when here are their pleasures, here are all their interests, and that thus they are made one with the nation in sympathy and feeling.

That portion of Her Majesty's Speech which relates to our foreign policy speaks of a most momentous period. Though measured only by a few months, events have occurred in it which may influence the history of this world for ages to come. Two nations, both our allies, both of whose rulers have sometimes given us cause to regret their policy, but still more often to sympathize with it, have struggled for the mastery. They have fought until there can have been but one feeling amongst us, of heartsoreness at the terrible carnage. It is not so much when one thinks of those who have died a soldier's death, fighting for their country; but when we think of the widowed wives, the starving children, the burnt homes, one cannot but wonder whether the maxims of our common Christianity have not been utterly forgotten. There is now a lull in the storm—God grant that it may be a sign of the end. Let us hope that the victors may show that magnanimity which is sure to be its own reward; let us hope, also, that when our sister Assembly across the Channel meets, under far different circumstances to those in which we meet to-day, proposals of peace will be laid before it which it may honourably adopt, and that the peace so concluded will be both immediate and lasting.

We are informed, Sir, that during the Recess Her Majesty's Government have followed the policy which was announced in the Speech at the close of last Session—that they have done their best to maintain the rights and strictly perform the difficult duties of neutrality, and that they have endeavoured to prevent an enlargement of the area of the war. They have also watched anxiously for an opportunity of procuring peace, and with that view have endeavoured to bring the combatants into communication. I sincerely hope that peace will result from their action. When, however, we see a war waged so fiercely as the present one, when not only two Governments but two nations are determined, the one to claim a large cession of territory, of which the other is equally determined not to yield one inch, the interference of neutrals becomes absolutely impossible. My own opinion on this point is a most decided one; I believe that at no period in this war would it have been possible for this country to interfere actively either on one side or the other. Granting this, it would, I think, have been beneath our dignity to offer remonstrances which might not have been received, and which could scarcely have been compatible with the neutrality which we professed. In the interest of civilization also it was our duty to do our best to limit the area of the war as much as possible, and any active interference on our part would have had an exactly contrary effect. The position of neutrals must have been felt as irksome by many; but I think this might have been prophesied, and is seen in every situation of life. When a contest is going on, those who by conviction are neutrals feel prompted, some from generosity of disposition, others from the mere love of fighting, to take part in the fray. The combatants themselves, especially the weaker one, naturally appeal for help to the bystanders. The result is that neutrals, however justified in their neutrality, must expect to be blamed, certainly by some amongst themselves, and by one or both of the combatants. The time, however, Sir, has, I hope, now arrived when it will be possible for us to interfere actively in the hope of procuring peace; and if we are successful, I hope the peace will be a lasting one—not a mere patched-up agreement, but a peace which will restore tranquillity to Europe. The negotiations will be arduous, all the more so that France has hardly yet decided who is to have a right to speak in her name.

Her Majesty expresses her regret that she has been unable formally to accredit her Ambassador to the Government of Defence; but to lay too much stress on this point would, I think, be unwise, as it would imply that this country had a claim to control the choice by another country of its own Government—a claim which I believe we should most certainly repudiate. The Government have always, I believe, been ready to treat with the French nation by whoever it might be represented.

Her Majesty has congratulated the King of Prussia on his acceptance of the title of Emperor of Germany—a title testifying to the greatness and importance of his kingdom. I hope he will be led to think that greatness sufficient, without making an addition to it, to guarantee him against foreign aggression.

Communications from different foreign Powers have led to the holding of a Conference, which is now sitting. Generosity to a great nation, must, I think, be a sufficient reason for wishing that France should be represented at it. No agreement come to without her knowledge and concurrence, could, I think, possibly be permanent. So far as we ourselves are concerned, I believe we may feel confident that the Government and the noble Earl who holds the seals of the Foreign Office will act as is his wont in a manner both courteous and dignified, and at the same time jealous of the honour of his country. I hope and believe the result of the Conference will be to uphold the performance of their duties by contracting Powers, and show that treaties are not made to be broken.

I am sure it is the wish of the country and of this House that our relations with America should be satisfactory. Questions have arisen between the United States and the Dominion of Canada on different subjects. They relate principally to matters of detail, and a Commission has been appointed to which they as well as the Alabama question will be referred. I hope the result will be a satisfactory settlement.

This country has always taken such interest in, and has made so many sacrifices for Spain, that we must, I am sure, rejoice in the prospect of her having a stable Government under a member of the House of Savoy.

The House will scarcely be surprised to hear that the inquiry into the outrages in Greece by its Government and tribunals has not been carried on in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. The melancholy events which took place last year give this country every right to insist that even-handed justice should be done.

The Chinese Government have shown every wish to give satisfaction for the outrages which were committed in one of their cities. It is a proof of our improved relations that this is likely to be secured by diplomatic action alone.

The House will have been glad to learn from the Royal Speech that, notwithstanding the frightful war that has been raging in Europe, our own relations with foreign Powers are satisfactory. Papers on the subjects to which I have referred will be laid before the House.

The condition of trade and industry is, with the exceptions which are within the personal knowledge of hon. Members, satisfactory, and consequently the Revenue is flourishing. In the present state of affairs, however, we must look for larger Estimates.

There is much in the subjects to which I have attempted to draw your attention which reminds me of an old proverb, which I only allude to because I saw it paraphrased the other day by the Prime Minister of one of the neutral Powers. He said that—"To secure peace we should be prepared to ward off aggression." I believe Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to be so prepared; but this will involve great military reform and probably increase of expenditure. The armies of Europe are no longer collections of armed men selected for the defence of their country, and which before acting offensively must be increased in number and organized for the field. If this were so now, our old plan of Ministers coming down to this House in the time of danger, and asking for their 20,000, 50,000, or 100,000 men, and power to call out the Militia, might be sufficient. They are, on the contrary, armed nations, ready, at a moment's notice, to defend themselves, or what affects us more closely, to strike a blow whilst the word which provokes it is scarce spoken. Whole classes amongst them devote their lives to the science of war. Every requirement of the State, learning, trade and manufactures, are made to give way to the one object of having an overwhelming army. In our insular position and with our great naval power, it is, I hope and believe, unnecessary for us to follow their ruinous example. The House will, however, I believe, agree with Her Majesty's Speech that the lessons of military experience afforded by the present war are numerous and important. We have seen, I think, that young soldiers are as good or better than old soldiers; that well-drilled men dismissed to their homes and called out again when required are not only cheap but efficient soldiers; that it is absolutely necessary for officers to devote themselves more than they have been in the habit of doing to the science of their profession; and that it is too late to organize an army when war has already broken out. When war was declared in July last France had to bring her soldiers from one corner of the country to another to join their regiments; the stores from another corner and the officers from another; all according to orders, sent to each from the War Office. In Germany, on the contrary, so soon as its army was mobilized, drilled men, who had returned to their homes, went to the nearest town where arms and stores were ready for them, and well-trained officers ready to enrol them according to a pre-arranged system, and, so soon as they had been organized, to constitute them into an army. And all this was done by a Government which is acknowledged to be the most economical in the world. How different are the facts in this country! We have a regular Army under its own officers, pensioners under theirs, Militia under one command when embodied, and another when disembodied, with Yeomanry and Volunteers partly under the War Office and partly not, and all these have no connecting link between them except one solitary Staff officer, who has to look after some 20,000 men, and he did not exist a year ago. Though we have, I believe, 400,000 men or more in the country, what can they do with such an organization. To take an instance of the present state of things. Supposing there happened to be in a country town 10 disembodied Militia sergeants on full pay doing nothing, and in the same town a detachment of regular soldiers, recruits, or some Volunteers in urgent need of drill and instruction, no human being that I can find out could order those sergeants to give that instruction. I will only add that whilst other nations have made their armies more and more local, we have made ours less so.

I am no preacher of panic; on the contrary, I think that the alternate fits of over-confidence and terror to which this country is a victim are a disgrace to it. But I believe that great reforms are only made amongst us when the public attention and interest are excited. This is now the case; let us therefore go thoroughly into the question and get the efficient army we most undoubtedly pay for. Holding these views, I am glad to see it stated that a Bill is to be introduced for the better regulation of the Army and the auxiliary Land Forces of the Crown.

I regret that I should have taken up so much of the time of the House on these subjects, which, I hope, will not occupy a proportionate portion of the Session, and that time will be found to pass the important measures of domestic legislation promised in the Speech.

The University Tests Bill stands first, and will, I hope, become law. During the last two Sessions so much time has been occupied by Irish legislation that the House must be glad to find that the state of that island shows a gratifying contrast with its state in the preceding winter, with, I am sorry to say, some partial and painful exceptions. The alteration of the status of the Church there renders an Ecclesiastical Titles Bill absolutely necessary. So much of the prosperity of this country depends on the existence of good feeling between employer and employed, that the House will be glad to see that the Government intends to deal with the question of Trades Unions. There is another Bill—the Mines Regulation Bill—which I should have liked to see mentioned, but which I am glad to hear is not forgotten. The Courts of Justice Bill will make an important improvement in the Appeal Courts of England. A Local Burdens Bill is to be introduced. The patience with which local taxation is borne, compared to the impatience to Imperial taxation, has always been a wonder to me. Now that the Government have taken the subject up, I trust they may be able to devise some plan by which local rates may be better managed, and some relief may be afforded. The Bill on secret voting will introduce an important reform into the machinery of our representation; and the Licensing Bill will be looked forward to with great interest. In one of the last paragraphs of the Speech it is truly said that an Education Bill is anxiously looked for in Scotland. It is many, many years ago since a Scotch Education Bill first appeared on the Table of this House, and many others have succeeded it; though some have been very near it, none have become law. I can only hope that Scotland may be rewarded by now getting an Education Bill that may be all the better for the delay. I trust the House will excuse me for suggesting the possibility that a few hours before midnight and even before Easter may be given to this and other Scotch Bills which are urgently required.

It only remains for me, Sir, to thank the House most sincerely for the kindness with which it has received what I have said; and before reading the Address—which I have endeavoured, however feebly, to induce them to adopt—I will express my belief that if the measures proposed in it are adopted, and the policy suggested in it is followed, it will tend to the good government of our country at home, and to the security of our honour abroad. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to convey the thanks of this House for Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech delivered to both Houses of Parliament:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that in accordance with Her Majesty's promise to pay constant attention to the subject of neutral obligations, Her Majesty has maintained the rights and strictly discharged the duties of neutrality during the war unhappily prevailing between France and Germany, which we trust, with Her Majesty, may, under the influence of moderation and forethought in the councils of both parties, shortly be terminated:

“To thank Her Majesty for endeavouring to prevent the enlargement of the area of the war, and to contribute to the restoration of an honourable peace, and to assure Her Majesty that we rejoice that the sphere of the war has not been extended beyond the two countries originally engaged:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has forbore from whatever might have been construed as gratuitous or unwarranted interference between parties, neither of whom had shown a readiness to propose terms of accommodation, such as to bear promise of acceptance by the other; and that She has been enabled, on more than one occasion, to contribute towards placing the Representatives of the two contending countries in confidential communication; though, unfortunately, until famine compelled the surrender of Paris, without any further result:

“Humbly to unite with Her Majesty in praying that the suspension in the constant accumulation on both sides of human suffering, which has been brought about by the Armistice now being employed for the Convocation of an Assembly in France, may result in a peace compatible, for the two great and brave nations involved, with security and with honour, and likely therefore to command the approval of Europe, and to give reasonable hopes of a long duration:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that, though She has been unable to accredit Her Ambassador in a formal manner to the Government of Defence, which has subsisted in France since the Revolution of September, neither the harmony nor the efficiency of the correspondence of the two States has been in the smallest degree impaired:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has offered Her congratulations to the King of Prussia on his acceptance of the title of Emperor of Germany at the instance of the chief authorities of the nation, and to assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we trust that this event which bears testimony to the solidity and independence of Germany, may be found conducive to the stability of the European system :

"To thank Her Majesty for endeavouring, in correspondence with other Powers of Europe, to uphold the sanctity of Treaties, and to remove any misapprehension as to the binding character of their obligations ; and to assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we confidently trust that the result of the deliberations of the Conference (which it was agreed by the Powers, co-signatories of the Treaty of 1856, should meet in London, and which has now been for some time engaged in its labours), may be to uphold both the principles of public right and the general policy of the Treaty and at the same time, by the revision of some of its conditions in a fair and conciliatory spirit, to exhibit a cordial co-operation among the Powers with regard to the Levant :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we share in Her regret that Her earnest efforts have failed to procure the presence at the Conference of any representative of France, which was one of the chief parties to the Treaty of 1856, and which must ever be regarded as a principal and indispensable Member of the Commonwealth of Europe :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has engaged in amicable communications with the President of the United States for the settlement of the several questions of importance which are not yet adjusted between the United States and the territories and people of British North America ; and that She has suggested the appointment of a joint Commission, and agreed to the proposal of the President that this Commission shall be authorized at the same time, and in the same manner, to resume the consideration of the American Claims growing out of the circumstances of the late war :

"To concur with Her Majesty in hoping that the establishment of a Prince of the House of Savoy on the Throne of Spain, by the free choice of the popularly-elected representatives of the Spanish nation, will insure for a country, which has passed with so much temperance and self-control through a prolonged and trying crisis, the blessings of a stable Government :

"To join with Her Majesty in regretting that the inquiry which was instituted by the Government of Greece into the history of the shocking murders perpetrated last spring at Dileos has not reached a termination answerable in all respects to Her Majesty's just expectations ; and to thank Her Majesty for Her promise not to desist from Her endeavours to secure the complete attainment of the objects of the inquiry :

"To assure Her Majesty that we learn with pleasure that the anxiety, which the massacre at Tien-tsin on the 21st of June last called forth, has happily been dispelled, and that it has been Her Majesty's earnest endeavour to provide for the security of Her subjects and their trade in those remote quarters, while recognising the Chinese Government as entitled to be dealt with in its relations with this Country in a conciliatory and forbearing spirit :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that, during these critical times, Her relations are as heretofore, those of friendship and good understanding with the Sovereigns and States of the civilized world ; and for directing that Papers illustrative of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the several matters on which She has touched, should be duly laid before us :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has approved of a marriage between the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, and to assure Her Majesty that we trust that this union may be prosperous and happy :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for acquainting us that the Revenue of the Country flourishes, and that the condition of trade and industry is on the whole satisfactory ; and for directing that the Estimates for the coming year should be promptly laid before us :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that in reviewing the important lessons of military experience afforded by the present war, and in endeavouring to turn such lessons to account by efforts more decisive than heretofore at practical improvement, we shall not fail to bear in mind the special features in the position of this Country, so favourable to the freedom and security of the people ; and if the changes from a less to a more effective and elastic system of defensive military preparation shall be found to involve, at least for a time, an increase of various charges, that we shall not grudge the cost so long as we are satisfied that the end is important and the means judicious :

"To assure Her Majesty that we shall give our anxious and impartial consideration to the Bill for the better regulation of the Army and the auxiliary Land Forces of the Crown, which She has directed should be laid before us, as well as to the work of general improvement in our domestic legislation, including the several measures brought before us during the last Session of Parliament, but which the time remaining at our disposal, after we had dealt with the principal subjects of the year, was not found sufficient to carry to a final issue :

" To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the inquiry made by a Committee of this House into the question of Secret Voting is now complete, and that a measure on that subject will be placed before us on an early day ; and to join with Her Majesty in trusting that the question of Primary Education in Scotland may this year be adjusted by the enactment of a just and effective Law :

" Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the condition of Ireland with reference to agrarian crime has, in general, afforded a gratifying contrast with the state of that island in the preceding winter, although there have been painful, but very partial, exceptions :

" Humbly to concur with Her Majesty in thinking that after the great measures of the two last Sessions which have so recently passed into operation, and which involve such direct and pressing claims on the attention of all classes of the community, a period of calm is to be desired ; and to join with Her Majesty in considering it wise to refrain from the discussion of any political question likely to become the subject of new and serious controversy in that country :

" Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we fervently join in Her Majesty's prayer that all our designs may receive the favour and aid of the Most High.

MR. MORLEY: Sir, I rise to second the Motion for an Address in Answer to the Speech from the Throne ; and I also must ask for the forbearance of the House while I briefly perform that duty. I share in the general pleasure experienced by the presence of Her Majesty in opening the Session, and I am sure that the terms in which my hon. Friend the Mover of the Address referred to that presence will be responded to by every Member of the House, and will be accepted throughout the country. I feel convinced that the more Her Majesty shows herself among her people the more thoroughly will affection towards the Throne be rooted among her subjects.

Sir, the House has assembled at a solemn crisis, when, in the words of the Royal Speech,—

" The ravages of the war may be renewed, after but a few days more, unless moderation and forethought, prevailing over impediments, shall sway the councils of both the parties, whose well-being is so vitally concerned."

At such a moment I desire to abstain from uttering a word which might belikely to interfere with that unanimity which is so desirable in approaching the Throne on the first night of the Session. I believe that the conviction exists throughout the country that the Government has performed the promise they gave at the close of last Session, and that constant attention has been paid to the subject of our neutral obligations, and that they have employed their best endeavours to prevent the enlargement of the area of the war. My conviction is that the exertions of the Government in that direction have sent a feeling of thankfulness and a sense of security into thousands of homes throughout this country, and that we have been pursuing our commercial and other engagements in the conviction that the Government was keeping the country out of complications with the tremendous conflict which has been raging on the Continent ; and I am sure that all will join in the prayer that the present suspension of hostilities may result in a peace compatible with the honour of the two great and brave nations which have been involved in strife.

The paragraph in the Speech which gives expression to a hope that the result of the Conference which has assembled with regard to the Treaty of 1856 will be—

" To uphold both the principles of public right and the general policy of the Treaty, and, at the same time, by the revision of some of its conditions in a fair and conciliatory spirit, to exhibit a cordial co-operation among the Powers with regard to the Levant," will, I believe, receive a hearty acceptance in every quarter. We must all greatly regret the absence of any representative of France from the Conference ; but we must, at the same time, confess that for that absence France is not responsible.

I cannot pass the reference to the misunderstanding between this country and America without some notice. It would, I believe, be difficult to overrate the importance attached out of doors to the desire that all matters in dispute between this country and the United States should be settled on terms fair and reasonable, and that an end should thus be put to the misunderstanding which has so long existed. There is abundant evidence that among the native Americans there exists a feeling of strong affection towards the "old country," and that the continued hostility which has been exhibited towards this country is chiefly confined to those of alien birth. I confess myself to be one of those who believe mistakes to have been made on both sides, and that it is due to ourselves, as well as to our Transatlantic kinsmen, that we should show a disposition to make amends for any injury we may have done them, if any such can be shown to have arisen from intention or from our default. There can be nothing unworthy or undignified in showing a desire to avert even the prospect of a suicidal war, or in placing two great nations, allied by race and language and by sympathy, on those terms of uninterrupted amity, which every Member of this House must desire to see established. It may even be regarded as a subject of congratulation that the dispute as to the Fisheries is so pressing as to have led to the appointment of a Commission, by which, on the invitation of the President of the United States, all matters in dispute between the two countries may be considered and disposed of.

I cannot leave the subject of Foreign Affairs without turning to the other side of the picture, and asking whether nothing can be done to lead to the establishment of some international tribunal, to which might be referred misunderstandings between one country and another, which, although serious in their results, are generally trifling in their origin. I should be glad to know, too, whether we cannot do something that might lead to a system of general disarmament, by which a constant source of danger would be at once removed, so that we might all breathe more freely, and not be continually exposed to the danger of witnessing or being engaged in conflicts and slaughter, against which our civilization so strongly revolts. Our commerce, our civilization, and, above all, our Christianity alike protest against the enormous wickedness and inhumanity of war. It may be Utopian, in face of the war now raging on the Continent, to hope that the common sense of the world will ever be strong enough to adopt such a plan of settling the disputes of nations;

but I speak under the influence of the agony and desolation to which the people of France have lately been subjected, and I cannot help pressing the subject on the attention of the Leaders on both sides of the House, and I believe all will agree that some attempt at least should be made in this direction.

I join most heartily with my hon. Friend (the Mover) in his congratulations on the approaching Royal marriage. I think it a matter of national congratulation that Her Majesty should, by sanctioning the marriage between a daughter of the Royal House and one of her distinguished subjects, have cast aside a custom more honoured in the breach than the observance, and that Her Majesty, by approving a marriage dictated by the heart's affections rather than by reasons of State expediency, should add another example in the Royal Family of domestic happiness and virtue.

With reference to the condition of our trade and industry, I believe that the great industries of this country were at no time better employed since the panic of 1866 than they are at this moment, although the effects of that panic have since that time hung over us like the poison of the Upas tree. No doubt the profits of trade have not been so large as in former years; but we have, during the past year, done a very considerable trade, and with some few exceptions the commerce of the country has been satisfactory. The Returns of the Board of Trade show that our exports during the 11 months ending 30th November last, exceeded those of 1868 by £18,000,000, and those of 1869 by £8,000,000, notwithstanding the interruption of our large transactions by the war between France and Germany; in the case of Germany showing a falling off of £3,000,000.

At the same time, while it is satisfactory to know that trade is prosperous and that there is a larger amount of employment in the manufacturing districts than has been the case since the panic of 1866, there is a melancholy reverse to the picture, and it seems that there are large portions of our population who have sunk into a state of chronic and apparently hopeless misery. Still, it is the opinion of those connected with the Poor Law that we are at last really turning the corner with regard to the condition of our very poor, and that our prospects are undeniably more hopeful was very favourable to negotiation; and I then took the liberty of suggesting to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that the policy of the Government should not only be a policy of neutrality, but of an armed neutrality. The right hon. Gentleman then said that a policy of armed neutrality was a very serious thing. That was why I recommended it. We had to deal with a very serious state of affairs, and it appeared to me that if we were to have a chance of coping with them and controlling them we should use an instrument of equal temper. The operation of an armed neutrality is three-fold. Its first tendency, of course, is to prevent; its second, to shorten war; and, in the third place—and not the least important—when pacification is contemplated, to insure the acceptance of just and temperate terms of peace, so that the seeds of future disquiet and inevitable struggle should not occur at the very moment when general tranquillity appears to be about to be accomplished. The last instance of an armed neutrality was the occupation of the Danubian Provinces by Austria; and I believe that no one will deny that that act on the part of Austria tended greatly to shorten the Crimean War. I do not presume for a moment to speak on this question of high general policy as one more competent to deliver an opinion upon it than any Gentleman who is sitting in this House; but hon. Members may, perhaps, recollect that four years ago myself and my then Colleagues had under responsibility the duty of considering a state of affairs almost identical with that state of affairs which obtained in the middle of last July. There was then a war imminent, occasioned by the rivalry between France and Prussia. Indeed, for 48 hours it appeared inevitable, and yet that war was prevented—was prevented by that Treaty which guaranteed the neutrality of Luxemburg, upon which I will not at this moment dwell, though I may have to advert to it. Now, that was an opportunity, certainly, all will admit, to those who had then the management of affairs, to form some opinion as to the motives of the principal actors in those transactions, the influences which regulated their conduct, and the objects which they contemplated; and we arrived then at three results for the future regulation of our conduct in these matters. First of all, which was of course obvious, that the danger to the peace of Europe was the rivalry between France and Prussia; secondly, that Prussia would never commence hostilities herself; and thirdly—and that was the most important and practical point—that it was consequently necessary that the English Government should concentrate all its resources, all its diplomatic influence, and exercise its unceasing vigilance at Paris, to prevent the ruler of France from commencing hostilities, which were so dreaded and deprecated. Now, it does not appear to me that Her Majesty's Ministers, when these unfortunate transactions commenced in July, did use that requisite energy, and were not sufficiently prepared for the circumstances which they had to encounter. I must remind the House that Her Majesty's Ministers were placed in a peculiarly favourable opportunity to press their opinions and their policy upon the Emperor of the French. I give Her Majesty's Government full credit for the energy and promptitude with which they obtained the withdrawal of the candidature of the Prussian pretender to the Throne of Spain. But their success in that proceeding gave them an additional claim and hold upon the French Government:—because the House will understand that for a mediator to come forward between two such Powers as France and Prussia, and accomplish so difficult a task as the withdrawal of the Prussian Prince who was a candidate for the Spanish throne, required a great exertion and expenditure of influence on the part of the Crown of this country. Influence, however considerable, is at the same time a limited quality. It cannot be expended for a certain object, or in a certain degree, without being diminished for other purposes in an equal degree. If Her Majesty, for instance, made an appeal to the King of Prussia that ultimately led to the withdrawal of the pretender to the throne of Spain, on other occasions and in reference to other matters, no doubt such a course would give Prussia a moral claim on England. Her Majesty had done the Emperor of the French a great service: and if at that moment—in July—the business had stopped as it was, the Emperor of the French would have had a considerable diplomatic triumph. It would have added to the credit of his dynasty and position, and would have been owing to the mediatorial influence of the Crown of England. When the Ambassador of the Queen therefore went to the Emperor of the French and announced that he had succeeded in his difficult and important office, and the Emperor—notwithstanding his appeal to the Queen to use her influence, and notwithstanding that Her Majesty had used her influence successfully—the Emperor said, “I will, nevertheless, proceed on my own course,” Lord Lyons should have declared—“This is an outrage to the Crown of England, and I am instructed to tell you that if you thus discard the result of the Queen’s intervention, and if this is the mode in which you express your gratitude for the successful exertions of the solicited influence of our Sovereign, you must take the consequences. I do not say we are going to throw ourselves into the fray, but the neutrality that we shall observe will be an armed neutrality.” If that had been the case, I do not believe there would have been war.

Sir, there was another ground on which I apprehend the right hon. Gentleman might have successfully appealed to the Emperor of the French and prevented the war, and that was—I called it to the recollection of the House at the end of last Session—that Russia and Great Britain had guaranteed to Prussia the possession of her Saxon provinces, and that if Russia and Great Britain had represented to the Emperor of the French—being neutral Powers, and his allies—that if he persisted in the insane course upon which he was about to enter, it was more than probable that he would force Russia and Great Britain to place themselves in a position if not absolutely of belligerents, yet in a hostile position, that would have influenced a Sovereign who was hesitating to the very end. You must remember that the Emperor of the French was for peace in the morning and war in the evening, and if the English Ambassador had, in the interval, represented a definite policy, such as that which I have indicated, there is every probability that the Emperor of the French would never have embarked in this war. Now, what was the answer given to me by the right hon. Gentleman? The right hon. Gentleman rose and repudiated the guarantees which had been given by this country and Russia to Prussia of the possession of her Saxon provinces, and he gave two reasons for his repudiation. The guarantee was given in 1815 under the Treaty of Vienna. The right hon. Gentleman said, that Prussia had become much more powerful since the guarantee of the Saxon provinces was given in 1815, and he said, in the second place, that the Diet of Germany had been recently abolished. Now, Sir, the first reason of the right hon. Gentleman was a strange one. If I owed a man £5,000, and he asked me to repay him, he would be surprised if I said to him—“True, it is, I owe you £5,000; but in the interval that has elapsed since the loan you have come into the possession of an estate of £5,000 a year, you are more powerful and richer, and therefore your claim can no longer be recognized.” Then, with regard to the second reason, the abolition of the German Diet, I answer at once that the guarantee does not at all refer to the German Diet in any sense whatever, and the only effect of the existence of the German Diet would be this—that, in all probability, Prussia would then have a right to appeal to the other Powers of Germany to assist her if her Saxon provinces had been invaded. The question for Her Majesty’s Government was this—What were the circumstances contemplated when the guarantee of the Treaty of Vienna was given by the Great Powers? Now, what were the circumstances? The circumstances were these—The signatories to the Treaty of Vienna, in the distribution arrangement of territory, were anxious that States bordering upon France should be strengthened. France was looked upon as the great disturber. Future aggression was contemplated by France, and it was therefore thought the best policy to strengthen, as much as possible, the States contiguous to the French boundary. For that reason the King of Sardinia received a great accession of territory, and the kingdom of the Netherlands was created. But the brunt of the struggle was evidently to be borne by Prussia. Prussia was to take the Rhenish provinces. Prussia required, and deserved, compensation for her great sacrifices and sufferings; and though she wished to find that compensation in the North of Germany, she ultimately accepted the Saxon provinces on condition that a guarantee should be given by the Great Powers, and especially by England, that practically, in case there was a war occasioned by the aggressions of France, and Prussia was attacked in her new territory, she should be guarded by the guarantee which was given. Now, what were the circumstances in July last? It is difficult for us to realize what was the state of affairs in July now that the King of Prussia is sleeping in the bed of Louis Quatorze at Versailles. But the fact is the King of Prussia was very much alarmed at the state of affairs; he had been surprised—I mean, of course, in a military sense—and was not prepared for war. Although, as I have heard, and have no doubt, the Prussians did not despair of ultimate success in the struggle, they were, in a military sense, surprised; and Russia, which has since made so many Field Marshals, was particularly anxious to support Her Majesty's Government in maintaining peace last July. There is no country more adverse to war than Russia, and it is very much to her credit; but, as she generally attains her objects without war, this is less surprising; but if there be any kind of war which Russia especially dislikes, it is an European war, and an European war commenced by France. Those were the circumstances we had to deal with in July last; and I maintain that if proper representations had been made to the Emperor of the French—if it had been pressed upon him that this country had entered into solemn engagements guaranteeing the provinces of Saxony to the King of Prussia—the Emperor of the French would have recoiled from the possible results of an infringement of the Treaty. Some hon. Gentlemen seem to be incredulous as to Prussia not being ready for immediate war in July last. I speak on the very highest authority when I say that Prussia was perfectly prepared for seeing the Palatinate overrun by the French. As far as the Palatinate was concerned, the Prussians had no doubt that the French would entirely and immediately overrun it, although they may have had confidence that they could prevent their capital being taken. It was under these circumstances—very different, of course, from those which now prevail—that a successful appeal, in my opinion, might have been made by our Government, upon this ground, to the Emperor of the French; and, I think the war might have been prevented. How was the case met by our Government, and, I am sorry to say, by more than one hon. Gentleman who spoke on the occasion alluded to? It was met on the part of the Government by a repudiation of a national engagement, a treaty of the most solemn and stringent kind. I want to know what hon. Gentlemen mean by the habit which, I am sorry to say, I have seen of late growing up in this House, of deriding the character and stipulations of treaties. What is the alternative if they are not supported, if they are not upheld by public opinion and by the sentiment of the House of Commons? What alternative is there? If it be true, as we have heard from a high authority, that no Power will observe a treaty the moment it has the opportunity of breaking it, you are really dissolving society into its original elements, which appear to me to be "blood and iron." It is easy to say that the Treaty of Vienna has been violated twenty times over, and that it is an obsolete document; but, in the first place, it has not been violated twenty, nor ten, nor five times over. No doubt, great changes have been made in the distribution and arrangement of territory which it sanctioned; but the Great Powers and statesmen who attended the Congress of Vienna most scrupulously and cautiously abstained from doing more than sanction an arrangement and distribution which was the inevitable consequence of a long war; and they never in any instance bound themselves to maintain the distribution that was then made, except in the case of the Saxon provinces of Prussia. Even if the Treaty of Vienna had been in some instances violated—which I dispute, but do not dwell upon now, because it does not touch the question—that is no reason why other important stipulations, which have not been violated, should not be maintained. There are many things of the utmost importance in the Treaty of Vienna besides the mere arrangement and distribution of territory. That was considered by the leading statesmen in this manner. They said—"We will not bind ourselves to any of these arrangements of territory; we contemplate that the time may come when changes will occur, and when those changes occur we will consider them on their merits." The withdrawal of the Austrians from Italy is no violation of the Treaty of Vienna in the circumstances under which it was accomplished; nor, I believe, in the opinion of higher authorities than myself, are any of those changes which have occurred violations of the Treaty, though they are changes of it. But in the Treaty there are things in importance equal to or greater than that of the distribution of territory. Take, for instance, the free navigation of rivers; that is one of the most important subjects that can possibly engage our attention. If, in the conduct of public business, a question arose as to the navigation of rivers, and I was told that the Treaty of Vienna was an obsolete document, and that it must not be referred to, I should be totally at a loss as to where I was to find any foundation for the doctrine of the free navigation of rivers, which is of the utmost importance to the welfare of humanity. Judging from what I hear, before a month is over we may be discussing in this House the free navigation of the Danube. Where would you be if the Treaty of Vienna, which was the first public document that, by a series of masterly clauses and provisions, established the free navigation of rivers—where would you be if the Treaty of Vienna was to be looked upon as a mere obsolete document? There is another river the free navigation of which, judging from all we hear, will be under our consideration soon. I mean the St. Lawrence. If we are not to respect the rights of nations as determined by the Treaty of Vienna, I do not believe there is any document in existence which will enable you to treat in a satisfactory manner the question of the navigation of the St. Lawrence.

In my opinion there was not sufficient energy exercised on the part of Her Majesty's Government in July last, at the commencement of these unhappy circumstances, to meet the conjuncture, and that they were not prepared for an event which, in my opinion, they ought to have contemplated. The proper policy for England would have been an armed neutrality; it might have prevented, and it certainly would have shortened the war; and if it had existed at this moment, I have no doubt it would have obtained for the discomfited just and temperate terms, and given a different character to Europe. But I may be told—"An armed neutrality might have been, under the circumstances, a very sufficient and proper policy; but how could an armed neutrality be adopted by a country without armaments?" I admit we should have placed ourselves in a position that might have been awkward and embarrassing if it could have been shown that this terrible war between rival races—for it comes to that—has been occasioned by neutrals not having that command of organized force which becomes great nations. It is possible that the Ambassador of the Queen, when he went to the Emperor of the French to make the appeal which I suggest, might have been answered in this manner—the Emperor of the French, who is extremely well-informed about everything in England, might have said—"Yes, Sir; I understand the policy of your Government is an armed neutrality; but an armed neutrality is a very serious thing for a nation that for a year and a half has been disbanding its veterans; an armed neutrality is a very serious thing for a nation with skeleton battalions and attenuated squadrons, and batteries without sufficient guns, and yet more guns than gunners; an armed neutrality is a very serious thing for a nation without a military reserve." The Emperor of the French might have added—"Nevertheless, you are still mistress of the ocean; yet, as you must have a Channel Fleet, and scarcely can do without a Mediterranean Fleet, I think it would be difficult for you to establish a fleet for the North Sea, since for a year and a half you have left off shipbuilding—since you have reduced your famous blue-jackets—since, as I well know, you have not been furnishing due artillery to your men-of-war, and you can't deny that for a year and a half you have been living on the stores that were accumulated by preceding Governments." Sir, I confess that would have been an answer to my suggestion of armed neutrality which would have been certainly for the moment somewhat embarrassing. I have no wish on this occasion to make a single criticism upon the conduct of the two right hon. Gentlemen who preside over the great Departments of the Army and the Admiralty. They were preferred to those eminent posts because, as was understood generally in the country, they were deemed, on the whole, the administrators most competent to reduce the naval and military strength of the country, and I am bound to say that the country, which is always just to public men, has unanimously agreed that these right hon. Gentlemen have entirely fulfilled the confidence reposed in them. But I cannot help making one remark upon the conduct in this respect of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman challenged the existence of the late Government upon a grave question of policy with regard to Ireland in a manly and straightforward manner. I have not changed my opinion as to that policy; I did not think it was a policy calculated to secure the tranquillity of Ireland and put an end to those feuds which seem indigenous to that country, or that it would make every district of that island a Utopia. Still, no one can deny that the right hon. Gentleman came forward on that occasion in a manly, straightforward manner. His policy was openly declared, and he appealed to the last Parliament, elected by the restricted constituency, and the last Parliament gave him a large majority. At a later period he appealed to the Parliament elected by the new constituency, and that majority was increased. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, gained his position, as far as the policy for Ireland was at issue, in the most clear and honourable manner; and no one grudged him his triumph—at least, I did not. But the right hon. Gentleman was a candidate for the suffrages of a large and, as he believed, of an economically inclined constituency, and, not having sufficient confidence in the bold policy he had enunciated, he suddenly turned round, and apparently to obtain votes, in which he did not even succeed, he denounced the then Government on account of the extravagance of their military and naval establishments. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Expenditure.] Well, we will not quarrel about the word; it comes to the same thing whichever we use. But the right hon. Gentleman, denouncing the extravagance of the late Government, said to the electors—"If I am in power next year I will terminate all this expenditure; I will put an end to these costly establishments, and you shall have a great reduction of taxation in consequence." This was a mere episode in the career of the right hon. Gentleman. It did not obtain him the seat he then solicited, nor do I believe it obtained for him half-a-dozen seats in this House. He would have had a complete majority if he had adhered to his first policy, which, though I believe erroneous, was the policy of a statesman, was perfectly intelligible, and had been deliberated upon in this House. My complaint against the right hon. Gentleman is that when he was summoned by his Sovereign to occupy the highest position in the kingdom, with a responsibility attached to it which no language can describe, and no degree of feeling equal, the right hon. Gentleman could not have been 10 minutes in the Cabinet of the Queen without knowing that the representations he had made respecting the military and naval expenditure of the country and the consequent reduction which he had pledged himself to was one of the greatest mistakes any Minister could possibly have made. The facts upon which this conclusion would be arrived at by him were State secrets at the time; but they have since been revealed in ravaged Europe. Why, the right hon. Gentleman sent his most trusty Councillor upon these subjects abroad to examine into these matters; he sent the member of his Cabinet on whom he naturally most depended for a correct opinion upon the state of Europe. Lord Clarendon went to the Continent. Lord Clarendon had conferences in Germany with more than one Sovereign, and with many most eminent statesmen. By one of those lucky combinations which sometimes occur in public life, Lord Clarendon met the Prime Minister of Russia, Prince Gortchakoff, who happened to be in Germany at that period, and he had confidential conferences with Prince Gortchakoff; and the consequence of these communications with German Sovereigns and statesmen and the Chancellor of Russia was that Lord Clarendon repaired to the capital of France, and conferred confidentially with the Emperor of the French. Now, Sir, there may be difference of opinion as to the position of the late Lord Clarendon as a statesman, as there will be upon the character and career of every public man. Perhaps Lord Clarendon was more adapted for an Ambassador than a Minister of State; others may differ from this view, but no one will dispute that Lord Clarendon was a consummate man of the world, with a quick perception of character, and gifted with that versatile and captivating sympathy which extracts secrets from the most reserved, and obtains the confidence of the most close. Now all this time Lord Clarendon was communicating confidentially with the right hon. Gentleman—the right hon. Gentleman admitted this at the close of last Session—and who can doubt what were the results at which Lord Clarendon arrived? Lord Clarendon must have comprehended the whole situation—the danger to the peace of Europe from the continued rivalry of France and Prussia; the causes which prevented Prussia from commencing the contest; the restraint necessary in consequence to impress upon the Emperor of the French; and the right hon. Gentleman must have been perfectly well aware of everything Lord Clarendon did, of everything that passed through his mind, and of all the information that he gained. Under all these circumstances, it is to me most difficult to comprehend the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot understand how a person filling the position of the right hon. Gentleman should have deemed himself bound by the rash rhetoric of the hustings to continue those reductions of what he calls expenditure, but which are, practically speaking, establishments, seeing that the reduction is, in fact, a reduction in the number of men and boys and in the amount of stores. How is it possible that the right hon. Gentleman could, possessing this knowledge, have pursued such a course, and countenanced the framing of harum-scarum Budgets which have dissipated the resources of the nation?

The danger which Lord Clarendon must have foreseen eventually resulted in the war between France and Germany; and now let me impress upon the attention of the House the character of this war. It is no common war, like the war between Prussia and Austria, or like the Italian war in which France was engaged some years ago; nor is it like the Crimean War. This war represents the German Revolution, a greater political event than the French Revolution of last century—I don't say a greater, or as great, a social event. What its social consequences may be are in the future. Not a single principle in the management of our foreign affairs, accepted by all statesmen for guidance up to six months ago, any longer exists. There is not a diplomatic tradition which has not been swept away. You have a new world, new influences at work, new and unknown objects and dangers with which to cope, at present involved in that obscurity incident to novelty in such affairs. We used to have discussions in this House about the balance of power. Lord Palmerston, eminently a practical man, trimmed the ship of State and shaped its policy with a view to preserve an equilibrium in Europe; and we have recently been favoured with a letter from M. Guizot to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in which the balance of power is declared to be absolutely necessary to the peace of Europe. We have heard hon. Gentlemen in this House, on some occasions, deride the idea of a balance of power as altogether a fancy; but what has really come to pass in Europe? The balance of power has been entirely destroyed, and the country which suffers most, and feels the effects of this great change most, is England. Now, what has been the first consequence of the destruction of the balance of power by this war, which I sincerely believe, if we had been energetic and prepared, this country might have prevented? The first consequence is that Russia repudiates the Treaty of 1856. There is nothing in diplomatic history so unqualified as the repudiation of the settlement of 1856 by Russia. Now, I am not going to inveigh against the designs of Russia. Russia has a policy, as every great Power has a policy, and she has as much right to have a policy as Germany or England. I believe the policy of Russia, taking a general view of it, to have been a legitimate policy, although it may have been inevitably a disturbing policy. When you have a great country in the centre of Europe, with an immense territory, with a numerous and yet, as compared with its colossal area, a sparse population, producing human food to any extent, in addition to certain most valuable raw materials, it is quite clear that a people so situated, practically without any seaboard, would never rest until it found its way to the coast, and could have a mode of communicating easily with other nations, and exchanging its products with them. Well, for 200 years Russia has pursued that policy; it has been a legitimate, though a disturbing policy. It has cost Sweden provinces, and it has cost Turkey provinces. But no wise statesman could help feeling that it was a legitimate policy—a policy which it was impossible to resist, and one which the general verdict of the world recognized—that Russia should find her way to the sea-coast. She has completely accomplished it. She has admirable seaports; she can communicate with every part of the world, and she has profited accordingly. But at the end of the last century she advanced a new view. It was not a national policy; it was invented by the then ruler of Russia, a woman, a stranger, and an usurper—and that policy was that she must have the capital of the Turkish Empire. That was not a legitimate, it was a disturbing policy. It was a policy like the French desire to have the Rhine—false in principle. She had no moral claim to Constantinople; she did not represent the races to which it once belonged; she had no political necessity to go there, because she had already two capitals. Therefore, it was not a legitimate, but a disturbing policy. As the illegitimate desire of France to have the Rhine has led to the prostration of France, so the illegitimate desire of Russia to have Constantinople led to the prostration of Russia. Now, when Russia repudiated the Treaty of 1856 I do not think the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government was a wise one. I admire the reasoning by which Her Majesty's Secretary of State showed to the Russian Minister the fallacy of his position; but I think that the inference he drew from his own premises was lame and impotent. Our proper answer to the first note of Prince Gortchakoff should have been to protest against it, and to have said at once that Russia must take the consequences of such a step. In that case, I doubt very much whether at this moment we should have heard any more about it. But that was not the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government. The plan of a Conference on the Treaty of 1856, which France could not attend, was not politic; and the inability of France to take part in it was alone a sufficient reason in refusing to listen to any such project. Let me recall to the House for a moment the circumstances under which the Treaty of 1856 was negotiated. I know there are hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who think the Crimean War was a great mistake. I am not one of them. I think the Crimean War might have been prevented. I have not the slightest doubt that in the month of July, 1854, if our Government had informed the Government of Russia that war would be the consequence of their passing the Pruth, the Pruth would not have been passed. I believe that is not now mere conjecture, but a matter of acknowledged fact. But when that war was declared I believe it was a just and necessary war; I believe there never was a war carried on for a nobler purpose or with purer intentions, nor one which the people generally of this country ever supported with more enthusiasm. There was a great demur at the time as to the terms of peace; they were not thought adequate. It is true they did not call upon Russia, under defeat, to yield up any of her provinces; and I wish that fact could be recollected by other Powers. It is true, also, that the Allies did not propose to mulct Russia by calling on her to pay a great indemnity; and that, too, should not be forgotten by nations who are influenced by precedents. But I think the Treaty was admirable, because it devised a plan for neutralizing the Black Sea, which absolutely, as far as human arrangements could control affairs, really prevented that part of the world again disturbing the general peace. Well, that Treaty was regarded at the time as a magnanimous Treaty. I believe it was so accepted by Russia. She obtained terms after the fall of Sebastopol as favourable as those which she refused at the Conference of Vienna. I doubt there is an example of such terms being offered by the conqueror under similar circumstances. Now, Sir, I do not pretend to divine what is passing at the Conference. All sorts of rumours are afloat; but I cannot understand, or conceive it possible, that a British Minister, after the immense sacrifices made by the Allies, and especially by this country, in order to obtain that Treaty of 1856, will consent in Conference to give up the whole point for which those sacrifices were incurred. There really is nothing in the Treaty of 1856 of vital importance—nothing that did secure and can maintain the general peace of Europe with regard to that part of the world, except the termination of the naval preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea by a plan which spared the pride of a great country. To obtain that result the Allies expended three hundred millions of treasure. I cannot trust myself to tell what was the loss in human lives, infinitely more valuable. You fought four pitched battles and made two of the most terrific assaults ever known in the history of sieges, and all to obtain this result. Why, there is hardly a family in England, from the haughtiest to the humblest, which has not some painful recollection of the sufferings and sacrifices of that war. In my parish church there is a memorial window to the memory of two sons of an hon. Baronet, once a Member of this House, both of whom fell in the Crimea. The eldest, who was little more than of age—a youth of great promise and distinguished appearance—had just married, and the very week after his marriage he was summoned to his regiment, one of the finest in our service—the 23rd Fusiliers. He fell at Alma after many acts of valour. Exactly a year afterwards his next brother, who had succeeded to his title—an officer of Artillery, also in the same army—died in the trenches before Sebastopol. The mother of those gallant youths raised that memorial window in my parish church because—to use her own words—amid her terrible sorrows she had the proud consolation of knowing that her sons had died for their country. But now you are going to tell her that she is not to have that proud consolation—that they did not die either for the honour or the interest of their country—that it was all moonshine. I think that the mothers of England will feel very differently in future, and the sons of England, too, will not be so lavish of their lives, if this mockery is to occur. But the most curious thing in all this affair of the Treaty of 1856 is the conduct of Her Majesty's Government when they received the note of Prince Gortchakoff; and it is to me perfectly incredible. What did Her Majesty's Government do? They consulted Count Bismarck—certainly a most eminent man, and there is no man whose opinion on a difficult question I should think more valuable. But he is the Minister of Prussia, who was not our ally in the Crimean campaign, and whose conduct then was equivocal and ambiguous; and they sent, as I understand—but we are to have the Papers laid before us, and I am sure Papers were never more wanted—they sent Mr. Odo Russell in their difficulty to consult Count Bismarck. Now, what said Count Bismarck? Count Bismarck said this—"I see that your Government is extremely indignant because Russia has repudiated the Treaty of 1856. Well, it is a very extraordinary thing; but only three months ago your Prime Minister repudiated a most solemn treaty with regard to my country—namely, that which guaranteed the Saxon provinces to my Sovereign." Why, at that moment it was a toss up whether those Saxon provinces would or would not be invaded, and I believe it is in those very provinces that Count Bismarck's estate is situated, though that is a matter that of course would not affect his opinion. However, Count Bismarck, with that cynical cordiality which distinguishes him, said—"Notwithstanding the way in which you have treated us, I will do everything I can for you. I will suggest a Conference, and the practical consequence of a Conference is that you condone the great offence of Russia, and then that will happen at the Conference which always does happen at Conferences to which Russia is a party, and particularly where Prussia also is a party—namely, that Russia will gain her object." But Count Bismarck is a man of the world who goes with the times; so he does not stop here—the Treaty of Vienna is an obsolete treaty; the Treaty of 1856 is now successfully repudiated by Russia; the balance of power no longer exists. And therefore the unfortunate Sovereign Prince of Luxemburg, to secure the neutrality of whose territory we had laboured, and had incurred so great a risk, has notice served upon him, which puts an end to the Treaty of Luxemburg. That is the third repudiated treaty. Now let me say one word about that Treaty. I wish to speak thus, because the matter has not been so much before the House of Commons as might be desirable, and the observations of a Secretary of State have not been correctly apprehended. By the Treaty of Luxemburg the five signatories gave a joint guarantee to maintain the neutrality of the Grand Duchy, and the question has been raised as to what were our liabilities in respect of the joint guarantee. I do not apprehend that as regards our liabilities to the Grand Duke of Luxemburg the slightest difficulty is likely to arise. I believe that the liability of each of the co-signatories towards the Grand Duke of Luxemburg merely extends to this—that they shall not themselves violate the neutrality of his territory. But the liabilities that the signatories to that Treaty incur to each other in respect of the engagement are much larger and of a far more complicated character. Guarantees of the neutrality of their territories are not given to Princes out of mere affection or personal respect—they are given for much larger objects, to secure the peace of Europe and to maintain the general tranquillity. And therefore a signatory of the Treaty who violates the neutrality of the territory of the Grand Duke of Luxemburg incurs a large responsibility to England and to the other signatories of the instrument; and it would be open to us, at any moment and in any manner we might think proper, to assert our rights if they should be so violated. It has been said that there is in existence a secret Treaty between Prussia and Russia entered into before the war. I make no statement to that effect myself. It once fell to my lot, in reference to transactions relating to the Crimean War, to state to this House that there was in existence a secret Treaty between two great Powers—France and Austria—having reference to the state of Italy, by which the former undertook not to attack the latter in case certain things should be done in the course of that war, and Lord Palmerston contradicted me upon the subject. In about a week after, however, Lord Palmerston, as a man of honour, having ascertained the real facts, thought it his duty to come down to the House and to acknowledge that such a Treaty did exist. I merely advert to that circumstance to show that I make no such assertions until I am convinced of their truth. When I am convinced of the existence of a Treaty such as I have described between Prussia and Russia, I shall state the fact openly in this House. I feel called upon, however, to make this remark—that if, when Her Majesty's Government communicated with Count Bismarck respecting the repudiation of the Treaty of 1856, they were ignorant of the existence of such a Treaty, they were exceedingly ill-informed; but if they were aware of its existence—and I wish the House to observe this possibility particularly—and yet under such circumstances made the appeal to Count Bismarck which led to this Conference, then I say that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government is of a very grave character, and that the censure of this House would be a very light punishment for them to undergo.

There is another Treaty upon which I will not stop to make a comment, which has been violated in consequence of the destruction of the balance of power produced by this war—a war which, I believe, England might have prevented, and that is the Treaty which secured Rome to His Holiness the Pope, entered into by the King of Italy, by which the latter bound himself to defend the former from all aggression. We were not parties to that Treaty, and can be only indirectly concerned and interested in it; but the violation of that Treaty is, in my opinion, complete. I am not at all surprised at the result; it is the necessary result of the alliance between the Papacy and Liberalism. Why the Pope should destroy Churches—even if they were Irish Protestant Churches—and why he should secularize ecclesiastical property, I never could understand. His Holiness, however, succeeded in his object; but the Protestant Church Establishment in Ireland was not legally disestablished at the time when the Papacy was disestablished itself. I do not dwell upon this Treaty, because I have no doubt but that in the course of this debate we shall have a satisfactory vindication of the policy of the Government, and a complete interpretation of their views, from the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird).

Now, Sir, I have shown the House what a complicated state of affairs, what difficulties, and what possible dangers have arisen in Europe from this war, which has destroyed the balance of power, and which war, I think, might have been prevented. But those difficulties and dangers are not limited to Europe. The Atlantic Cable unhappily conveys not only communications relating to commercial matters. Everything that happens in the diplomatic circles of Europe appears to reach the other side of the great waters with a rapidity rivalling that by which the knowledge of the price of gold and of cotton is conveyed across the Atlantic. I am surprised at the course which was taken by the Sovereign of America in this matter. I should have thought that he would not have condescended to imitate the example of Europe. But to my great surprise the United States have also got hold of a Treaty with this country which they intend to repudiate. This Treaty was a treaty negotiated—as all treaties entered into with the United States have been negotiated—with great concessions on our side. The enjoyment of it was lost, wantonly lost by the United States by their abrogation of the treaty of reciprocity with Canada, although even after that occurrence they enjoyed the advantages of its provisions for many years longer by the forbearance and indulgence of English statesmen. That Treaty is now brought forward by the United States as an act of injustice on our part and as a means and opportunity for misunderstanding. I was very glad to hear from the Queen's Speech that the attention of England had been directed to this question, and that there seems to be a prospect of having at least some formal communication upon the question. There is one point connected with America which I cannot refrain from noticing, and that is, the extraordinary tone in which the authorities of America communicate with our Government and with the people of this country. The tone of the American Government towards the Government of England is different from that used towards the Government of any other country. It is not, as I once thought, the rough simplicity of Republican manners that occasions a rudeness so painful. Nothing can be more courteous than the Government of the United States to the Russian Government and, I have no doubt, to the German Government; but if they have any communications to make to the Government of this country, or any cause to give their opinion as to the conduct of the English people, a tone is adopted and language used which it may be forbearing not to notice for a time, but which, if persisted in, must ultimately lead to consequences which, though they may not be intended, all will deplore. Now, I am not going to dwell upon the wild words of demagogues, who, I suppose, in the United States, as in all other countries, are reckless in their expressions. I am talking of persons of high official authority. I will take, for instance, the chief Senator (Mr. Sumner)—I look upon the Chairman of the Committee for Foreign Affairs as the chief man in the Senate, and only second to the President, for to a certain degree he exercises the functions of royalty. No treaty with the United States can, I believe, be concluded without his concurrence. This gentleman commenced his Parliamentary career last year by an invective against the British Government. Having to deal with the difficulties between the two countries, having to exercise the functions of a judge and a statesman, he commenced the campaign by a violent invective against the English Government and the English nation, exciting the passions of the people of America. Then the President of the United States, the Sovereign of America, recently in one of those grave State papers which a person of his exalted position periodically produces, having occasion to speak of the English Government and people uses language which I wish I could describe as either friendly or respectful. It was, I think, very unfortunate that the Fenian prisoners were sent to America. It is a questionable thing to me whether they ought to have been amnestied. But, as I have said on a former occasion, it is best that an amnesty should be complete; and if they were to be freed I think they ought to have been allowed to go to Ireland, instead of being sent to America as first-class passengers in a Cunard boat, with a £5 note in their pockets. The people of America received them, in pursuance of the system of always insulting this country, with all honour, and by a large majority in the House of Representatives decided to treat them with every possible respect. I want to know what is the reason why the Government and people of England are treated by the Government of the United States in a different manner from that in which other countries are treated. The time has come when we ought to know that. At the first blush one would think it impossible for two nations to be on terms of more thorough and complete understanding. Notwithstanding the Celtic or Teutonic emigration which the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Address (Mr. Morley) has noticed, the English character of the original settlers in these colonies has always predominated. They have, perhaps, improved our language; but they still speak it. We have the same laws, the same literature, and the same religion. Our commercial relations are on a vast scale; and though our terms of exchange might be improved, the reciprocal benefit is great and unquestioned. There is every circumstance which ought to unite two nations in the bonds of real friendship, and yet it is impossible that the Government or the people of this country can be brought in any public way before the authorities of the United States without some expression being used, or some course taken which is offensive to our honour. What is the cause of this? It cannot arise from the original quarrel. The result of the original quarrel was certainly calculated to leave feelings of humiliation and vindictiveness, but not on the part of the Americans. Nor can it arise from the course taken by England during the Civil War. Nothing is more unjust than the statement that the cause of the Southern States was taken up by either party in this country; and, with regard to the charges so constantly made, that the party represented on this side of the House acted in a party sense with regard to the Southern Confederation, it is utterly untrue. There were hon. Gentlemen, no doubt, on both sides of the House who expressed their opinions and brought forward Motions; but nothing like a party Motion was ever made. The late Lord Derby, who was well acquainted with America, from the first believed that the Northern Confederation would be successful, and as regards the House of Parliament where he was eminent he surely may be assumed to represent the party sitting on this side. As regards this House, I may, perhaps, though with less authority, claim to be regarded as the representative, and under no circumstances whatever did I sanction any such Motion, and for this reason alone, if not others—I felt that it was impossible to limit our interference to the recognition of the Southern States. It would have involved us in a war with the Northern States, and of such a result I would not take the responsibility. Sir, there is no ground for the charge. It is futile. The reason of this offensive conduct of the United States is this—There is a party in America, who certainly do not monopolize the intelligence, the education, and the property of the country, and who, I believe, are not even numerically the strongest, who attempt to obtain political power and to excite political passion by abusing England and its Government because they believe they can do so with impunity. These are the last men who would take this tone if they thought England would resent such conduct; but the idea is impressed upon them that they may insult the Government of England with impunity. You may say, if they have no really hostile intent, and it is a mere electioneering game, is it not better for us to be forbearing and contemptuous? Well, it is not exactly that. The danger is this—Habitually exciting the passions of millions, some unfortunate thing happens or something unfortunate is said in either country; the fire lights up, it is beyond their control, and the two nations are landed in a contest which they can no longer control or prevent. As there is to be a Commission, it would be a very good opportunity for us to come to some clear understanding on the subject, and let it be known England cannot be insulted or injured with impunity; though I should look upon it as the darkest hour of my life if I were to counsel or even support in this House a war with the United States, still the United States should know that they are not an exception to the other countries of the world—that we do not permit ourselves to be insulted by any other country in the world—and that they cannot be an exception. If once our naval and military establishments were in that condition which, I hope, on Thursday, or some early day, we shall find they are—if once it is known that Her Majesty's dominions cannot be assaulted without being adequately defended—all this rowdy rhetoric which is addressed to irresponsible millions, and, as it is supposed, with impunity, will, I believe, cease.

Now, Sir, that is the state of affairs which we have to deal with at the commencement of the Session. And as there is not one of the subjects which I have mentioned which will not, probably, be brought forward for our consideration in its course, it has seemed to me not inappropriate that, on the first day, some general view should be put before the House of the consequences of the war between Germany and France. The whole machinery of States is dislocated. There is not an engagement between Powers which is not impugned or looked upon with suspicion and without confidence, and it is very likely that with every one of the countries to which I have alluded we shall have to discuss our diplomatic engagements and the stipulations which now exist. I hope I may presume to say that I have never been what is called an alarmist. I have never magnified the dangers which this country has had to undergo. I hope I may add that I have never been in favour of a meddlesome policy, though I am not prepared to support what is called non-intervention under all circumstances. I am quite aware that the relations of England to Europe are different now from what they were at the Treaty of Utrecht, or even in the time of Lord Chatham, and that other than European elements, great in themselves and considerably affecting the balance of power, have grown up which could not have been taken into consideration by the statesmen of that day. But I cannot resist the conviction that this country is in a state of great peril, and that it will require the utmost prudence and courage to extricate her from the consequences of recent events. A distinguished man, long a Member of this House, an eminent statesman, whom I am sure even his opponents must always speak of with respect—Lord Russell—has called the attention of the public to the fact that there is in States a natural jealousy of any dominion that rises up chiefly by the influence of commerce. There is no doubt that there have been periods before this when a feeling—not, I think, a rational, but a general feeling—of hostility to the United Kingdom has existed which nothing but fortunate circumstances or the exertion of great energy on our side could have dispelled or baffled. I remember in a discussion in this House 20 years ago, when a feeling of this kind had grown up, reminding the House of what occurred at the Treaty of Cambrai. That was a treaty under which the Confederate Powers of Europe determined, without any cause whatever and from mere jealousy of Venice, of her mercantile spirit and great wealth, and from irritation at the reserve with which she had declined mixing herself up in their separate plans, to cut the pinions of that great Republic. No doubt there is even considerable similarity between the condition of Great Britain and the Republic of Venice. Venice had all the commerce of the world, the finest navy, and a good army; commanded by strangers and foreigners it is true, but still by distinguished generals. She held Cyprus in fee; she possessed the Morea, the peninsula of the Ægean—the same to her that India is to us—the best islands of the Ionian and Ægean seas, and every province of the terra firma of Italy distinguished for civilization and culture, except the Grand Duchy of Milan. But there are also differences between the United Kingdom and Venice. Venice had not a numerous and warlike population. She had not a high-spirited middle-class, and she had a suspicious and tyrannical oligarchy instead of an open and real aristocracy. I understand that some distinguished statesmen have been speaking of England as a country that is past as regards political power, and as one that has sacrificed all her reputation and her real power merely to the accumulation of wealth. Well, I am glad that during the 50 years of peace that more or less we have enjoyed—we have accumulated wealth, and it is a great consolation to me to know that if—which God forbid—we should have to defend ourselves and assert our position in the world, we could enter, as I am sure no other Power could, into a third campaign without finding the sinews of war fail us. It is a great source of strength to England to feel that if she enters into a quarrel which is necessary and just, she is not likely to find her resources exhausted; whereas, it would be very difficult to fix on any other Power, with all their boastfulness, that in the second or third year of hostilities would not be found upon the different Exchanges of Europe endeavouring to raise loans to an amount, moreover, not as large as we could raise by a single tax. But in the 50 years which have elapsed we have done something besides accumulating money, and it is well that this should be known by those who make such free comments upon England and the English people. The people of the United Kingdom enjoy at this moment complete personal and political liberty. Those two great subjects that used to disturb our predecessors, and were the foundation of half the encumbering orders of this House—trade and religion—are no longer any source of difficulty to us since they have taken the shape of commercial freedom and religious equality. We passed last year a Primary Education Bill, not so various in its elements as I hope to live to see pass, but still a real Elementary Education Bill. The people of this country have had the opportunity of following their industry and enjoying their rights in a manner which cannot be equalled by the records of any modern or ancient nation; and I do not believe that a population thus circumstanced is going to give up such blessings without a struggle, or will yield so pre-eminent a position without at least proving that they are worthy of it. There are many observations that I could make upon details of the gracious Speech and of the Address which we are called upon to vote in answer. It is one of the longest Speeches that, I believe, was ever delivered to Parliament from the Throne. It touches on many subjects; there are expressions in it which might be criticized; and there are some points which might, under ordinary circumstances, warrant even a graver notice. But I think it of importance that we should show to Europe and to America, on the present occasion, when we re-assemble, an united Parliament; and though, no doubt, we shall have differences of opinion on minor points, I apprehend that on the vital question there is no difference of opinion among the great majority of the House. I believe we are resolved that the military and naval institutions of this country shall be adequate to the occasion. We hope—aye, more than hope, we believe—the Government are going to bring forward measures which will meet the exigencies of the case. In that case I shall give those measures my entire support; if there are points of detail of which I may not approve, I shall waive my opposition, if it will endanger the security of their passing. I would even make some sacrifice of principle to support their proposals, if they be adequate to the occasion, as I hope and believe they will be. But, although I am not prepared with any Amendment upon this occasion, or to ask the House to come to any declaration of opinion upon a state of affairs that I do not think devoid of peril, and which all, I think, must admit to be most critical, still I could not be altogether silent, after the conversations which occurred in the last days of the late Session, and the events which have since taken so grave a form. The opinions which I have expressed I have been emboldened to offer because I know they are shared by those who generally act with me in public life—and also because I know that a great body of persons throughout the country sympathize with us in our resolve, which is, as far as our power may enable us to effect that object, to uphold the greatness of our country, and to maintain the Empire of the Queen.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friends the Mover and Secunder of the Address have each of them discharged a part well known not to be free from difficulty in a manner that I am sure will tend to conciliate for them the favour of this House, and to inspire in all of us a hope that neither of them will be too much attracted by sympathy, or any other cause, into the rank of silent Members. But since my two hon. Friends have sat down the debate has assumed a different character. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) has consisted in so large a degree of charges of the most pointed character against the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, that I hope the House will think I am not taking an undue liberty if I rise at once for the purpose of meeting the challenge he has given us, without, in the slightest degree, questioning his title to bring these accusations forward. I appeal to the judgment of the House, and I shall endeavour to show that there is not a shadow of foundation for the accusations he has made. As the right hon. Gentleman has found it necessary to traverse a field of considerable breadth, I will at once point out those portions of his speech with which I do not find that the respect I am bound to pay him makes it my duty to follow him on the present occasion. In the first place, I shall not touch on Lord Clarendon's visit to the Continent in 1869, other than to say that from whence the right hon. Gentleman derives his information I know not, except it be from the inexhaustible repositories which his own brains supply. During the whole time when Lord Clarendon was Foreign Minister of this country in the present Government, I certainly had the honour and satisfaction of communication with him rarely intermitted for a single day. My evidence, I admit, is of a negative character; but, though negative, it is tolerably strong, and I can assure the House that the fabric which the right hon. Gentleman has built up of Lord Clarendon's supposed communications, plans, and schemes, which were the object of his tour, is a fabric wholly without foundation in fact, so far as I am able to see. With respect to the subject of Rome, as my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) has given notice of raising a discussion on it on a very early day, I will take the liberty likewise of omitting that topic from any observations I have to make. And with regard to America, I wish to say a very few words, for certainly the right hon. Gentleman, as well as the House, will feel that it would hardly be expedient at this particular moment, in the position I have the honour to fill, if I should undertake on the part of the Government to state our exact appreciation of the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman on certain American matters. One thing I will say, which is due to the right hon. Gentleman, that I think the course of forbearance and prudence he pursued during the American War entitle him, if any man, to be a critic in this matter without offence; and one thing I will say for myself, which is this—that with him I deplore that licence of speech and that misapprehension of occurrences on this side of the water which we occasionally notice in portions of the American Press. I feel that our best and safest course is to trust to the judgment and good sense of the mass of the American nation themselves to discountenance, neutralize, and dishearten whatever injustice the effects of rash and intemperate speech may be calculated to effect. We are at the present moment upon the very eve of despatching to America a Commission, of which my noble Friend the President of the Council (Earl De Grey and Ripon) will represent British interests. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that this is not the time for discussing the various matters with which that Commission will have to deal. Papers will be laid before the House explaining the conduct of the Government, and the merit of that conduct is fair matter for the consideration of the House. My noble Friend will be assisted in the Commission by Sir Edward Thornton, the able, prudent, and trusted representative of this country in America, and Sir John Macdonald, Prime Minister of Canada, than whom, perhaps, no one is so well, certainly no one is better, qualified to represent and defend the interests of the Empire in every question that affects British North America. The main part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman naturally turned upon the discussion of the circumstances of the Continental war, and, as he entertains the opinions that he has expressed to-night, I am the first to admit that, whatever be the practice commonly prevailing in regard to abstention from polemical discussion on the night of the Address, the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly justified in departing from it; although I think, on the other hand, he will admit that the necessity of raising charges so grave in his place in Parliament is a necessity in some degree adverse to the attainment of that object which he declares he has so much in view and at heart—namely, the object of presenting to foreign nations perfectly united councils. Now, I take the argument of the right hon. Gentleman to be a very simple one, and I will first grapple with that portion of it which refers to the destruction of the balance of power, and the Note which was issued in the autumn by Prince Gortchakoff. The right hon. Gentleman says that we were quite wrong in the mode in which we dealt with that Note. Well, Sir, I am sorry that we have not the suffrage of the right hon. Gentleman; but I am bound to say that, as far as I have any means of judging of the state of the public mind, I do think that the answer which was made by my noble Friend, Lord Granville, upon the receipt of the Note of Prince Gortchakoff was recognized by the country as a becoming, adequate, and manly answer. But the right hon. Gentleman says that, after issuing that answer, to which he does not object in itself, we then proceeded to commit a gross error in making our appeal to Count Bismarck—a very clever man, as the right hon. Gentleman, not too liberal, says; but one into whose mouth the right hon. Gentleman has found it necessary or expedient to put arguments and statements that Count Bismarck himself never was ingenious enough to discover. We made no appeal to Count Bismarck whatever. We took our own course in reply to the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, and, having taken our own course, it became a proper subject of communication to the other Powers of Europe who were the other parties to the Treaty of 1856, and among those Powers was Prussia. The right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that Prussia was not our ally in the Crimean War; but Prussia was our ally in the negotiations preceding the war, and Prussia was a party to the Treaty itself. Do not let me be misunderstood. We did not exclude Prussia from the communication that we made to every other Power concerned in that Treaty; but a special appeal to Count Bismarck we never made, and that is one of the suspicions upon which the argument of the right hon. Gentleman on this part of the case depends. The right hon. Gentleman made some general observations with regard to the moderation on the part of the victorious Power, and when the moment comes for negotiation, though it is not prudent or desirable for me to discuss it now in debate. I cannot pass it by without stating my general concurrence. Well, I think I may pass to the main subject of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the present war and the conduct of the Government in connection with the present war. His charges are perfectly clear. He says we were right in maintaining neutrality, but that we maintained a wrong kind of neutrality. We ought to have maintained an armed neutrality: maintaining an armed neutrality, we should have been able to prevent the war—certainly to shorten it, and as certainly to improve the terms on which peace is to be finally concluded. But we did not use energy enough in our representations at the critical moment before war broke out. We did not make use of the services we had rendered to France. We did not make use of the guarantee by which we were bound to Prussia. If we had made use of these documents we should probably have been able to prevent war arising. We were paralyzed, because we had unduly reduced the armaments of the nation in order to redeem rash pledges given by me on the hustings in Lancashire, and to enable my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to propose to the House and

carry through his harum-scarum Budget. I hope that is a tolerably fair statement of the charge of the right hon. Gentleman. There are many of the things which the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, describes as placed entirely beyond argument, as admitted by everybody, which, as I have often been compelled to do before, I must take up in a bundle and put them aside as wholly unfounded. But with regard to armed neutrality, I own it, with some reluctance, that I followed the right hon. Gentleman into the cloudy controversy that he has raised. What is this armed neutrality? I have heard of armed neutrality in history. I recollect an armed neutrality of about 1780, and with that armed neutrality war, so far from being stopped, was extended. That portentous evil was made even more portentous from the admixture with it of this armed neutrality. I will not merely criticize the phraseology of the right hon. Gentleman—the right hon. Gentleman is privileged in phraseology with gifts of invention, and copious and powerful mastery which I cannot imitate, and which occasionally, no doubt, may lead to my coining a phrase less felicitous than those he is frequently so happy and able to produce. There was a case of armed neutrality—the case of Austria and the Principalities—which the right hon. Gentleman says all persons admitted to have shortened the Crimean War. Now, the case of Austria was not a case of armed neutrality at all, but an especial operation directed to a particular point. Austria never professed to be neutral in the Crimean War. Upon the occasion of the siege of Sebastopol the driving of the Russians out of the Principalities had for its main military effect nothing but this—it placed a large and neighbouring force at the disposal of Russia for the defence of Sebastopol. I am not finding fault with the proceeding; I am endeavouring to show how lightly the right hon. Gentleman deals with the facts of history. But the right hon. Gentleman says we did not use sufficient energy in preventing war; and those who have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman will really be under the impression that he pointed out to us this lack of energy at a period when it was not too late for us to amend our defective policy. He has spoken to-night as if the speech he made last year was made anterior to the war. On the contrary, it was a speech made during the war; it was a speech made by a person who was in possession of all the steps which had been taken by the Government in reference to the war. He thinks it was before the war; but the date of it was the 1st of August, when war had been declared a fortnight; in fact, it was the day of the battle of Saarbrück, and it was within three or four days of the battle of Woerth. The right hon. Gentleman says we did not use energy enough. I want to know what it was we were to do. Well, we were to go to the French and we were to say—"If you exercise your own free discretion towards Prussia as to what is or what is not sufficient reparation, that will be an outrage upon the Crown of England?" When the right hon. Gentleman had used that strong phrase he immediately felt that from such a phrase there would arise a presumption that we were to go to war, if necessary, in support of that strong language; but he disclaimed the intention of going to war in support of it. We were to have told France that she was inflicting an outrage upon the Crown of England; but we were to abstain from saying that that outrage would be resented on our part. And that is what the right hon. Gentleman calls a recommendation to use greater energy than that which we used. We were to have said to France—I am quoting the words of the right hon. Gentleman—"You must take the consequences;" and France might safely have taken the consequences, according to the right hon. Gentleman's position, for the consequences were not to be war, but they were to be our high displeasure—consequences which I think it very possible a people much less powerful and high-spirited than the French would have been perfectly content to take in resenting an unwarranted and excessive intrusion from a foreign Power into a province which was not its own. It is not the question whether France was right, or whether she was wrong. In mild and friendly terms we did state to her that, in our judgment, she was wrong in not accepting the withdrawal of the candidature of Prince Hohenzollern; and, having done that, we felt that we had discharged our whole duty, and in discharging our whole duty we had exhausted our whole right. The right hon. Gentleman has another argument. He says we had entered into a guarantee with Prussia which I repudiated last year, and which, if we had used it properly, would have given us a position of authority with respect to France. That is to say, if I understand the argument, we should have been justified in going to France and speaking thus—"Pray observe we are bound to Prussia by a guarantee which will compel us to go to war in case the Saxon province is invaded, and, that being so, as we have an interest in the quarrel, we are entitled to require you to hold back." But the right hon. Gentleman, at the same time that he holds we were thus entitled to claim an interest in the quarrel and a commanding power over the act of France, on the ground of our being under an obligation to go to war, has expressly disclaimed the idea of our going to war in the case, and has told us that he was not ready to counsel such a course. The right hon. Gentleman has laid down doctrines with regard to guarantees which are totally fatal to the argument he has used. I beg the House to follow me while I try to apply to the case his argument and opinions. He says we were to present ourselves before the Emperor Napoleon, and claim the right to check the policy of France: because the policy of France was war, and that war might involve the invasion of Saxony, we should be bound by our guarantee, and consequently bound to take up arms. In the major portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman he laid down a theory perfectly new—I never heard it before—of the nature and binding force of guarantees. What is it? He says that in the case of giving a territorial guarantee, you bind yourself to the Sovereign of the territory to respect that territory; you bind yourself to the other parties to the guarantee in a much higher degree, and there the liability of going to war even may be involved. [Mr. DISRAELI: In a joint and separate guarantee.] The guarantee is not a joint and separate guarantee. It is this—

"Austria, Russia, Great Britain, and France guarantee to his Majesty the King of Prussia and his descendants and successors the possession of the countries marked out in the 15th Article as full property and sovereignty."

That is a joint guarantee; in the strictest sense it is a joint guarantee. Now, I have got from the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman a definition of the exact binding force of a joint guarantee, and from his mouth I fasten him to this—that the amount of obligation put upon us by that joint guarantee, so far as regarded Prussia and the sovereignty of the territory, was that we were ourselves to respect the King's possession of that sovereignty, and it amounted to nothing more. And when the right hon. Gentleman can reconcile together these two portions of his speech in which he laid down doctrines, one of which directly inculcated us, and the other of which directly exculpated us, I will only say that he will show an ingenuity greater than he has ever manifested in the whole course of his long Parliamentary career. The right hon. Gentleman says there has been a great deal of most melancholy talk with regard to the repudiation of treaties, and I might agree with the right hon. Gentleman up to a certain point. What we think of the sanctity of treaties is to be learnt from the declarations of Lord Granville during last autumn. But do not let us exaggerate the case; do not let us make matters worse than they are. By needlessly finding other Powers guilty of the repudiation of treaties, we are not taking a course likely to mollify or to convert them; but we are taking a course likely to isolate ourselves, and, in isolating ourselves, to deprive ourselves of all power for good. The right hon. Gentleman says that an end is now put to the Treaty of Luxemburg. I must say I think there was no occasion on which the Luxemburg Treaty was in so great danger of being put an end to as it was upon an occasion which occurred within a fortnight after it had been signed. That was the occasion when the doctrine was laid down, or understood to be laid down, that when a number of Powers concurred in a guarantee, any one of those Powers making default, the rest were absolutely released. I can only say that so long as the idea that such a doctrine was laid down by the British Government was allowed to possess the public mind all Englishmen should be cautious of using rash language in charging others with the repudiation of treaties. But I deny that the Treaty of Luxemburg has been put an end to by what happened in the autumn. I presume the right hon. Gentleman to mean that when he heard of the proceeding of the Prussian Government in regard to Luxemburg, it was a proceeding which raised apprehension in his mind; and so far I am perfectly willing to travel with him. But, consider, we have had from what I ought to call the German Government a most explicit and full assurance that the objection which they took to the proceedings of Luxemburg was an objection with respect to military purposes and military necessities alone, and that they expressly, fully, and absolutely recognized the binding character of the Treaty of 1868. It is not for us to maintain, and the right hon. Gentleman will not maintain, that it will be just on our part—nay, more, that it would be politic—to say that the Prussian Government had put an end to the Treaty. Before I part altogether from the question of the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, I must refer to another portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He discussed at great length—perhaps greater length than was necessary on an occasion of this kind—the Crimean War. He said that one valuable result of that war was the neutralization of the Black Sea, and that when we received the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, stating that in consequence of what Russia considered to be breaches of treaty she was no longer bound to observe its stipulations with reference to the Black Sea, we ought to have warned her that she must take the consequences; and what the consequences are in this case there can be no doubt whatever. But the right hon. Gentleman says that the Treaty of 1856, if it produced nothing else, produced one result of the utmost value and of the most vital importance in the East—namely, the neutralization of the Black Sea. That was never, so far as I know, the view of the British Government. In this House, in the year 1856, I declared my confident conviction that it was impossible to maintain the neutralization of the Black Sea. I do not speak from direct communication with Lord Clarendon; but I have been told since his death that he never attached value to that neutralization. Again, I do not speak from direct communication, but I have been told that Lord Palmerston always looked upon the neutralization as an arrangement which might be maintained and held together for a limited number of years, but which, from its character, it was impossible to maintain as a permanent condition for a great settlement of Europe. However that may be, let me now try the wisdom of the right hon. Gentleman by the doctrine he lays down. It is this—that we ought to have held very short language with Russia, ought not to have entertained the project of a Conference, and, at all hazards and all extremities, ought to have staked ourselves upon the neutralization of the Black Sea. Now I come to the ground of positive fact when I say that if we had been prepared for that most chivalrous resolution we should have adopted it with our eyes open to the fact that no one Power in Europe shared our opinion, or would be in the slightest degree responsible for our acts. Who is it that you would have looked to in order to maintain the policy in the East, if matters now stood again as they were? France. But France by official acts expressed her readiness to give up the neutrality of the Black Sea. Which is the Power most disposed to go with us in maintaining the spirit of the Treaty of 1856? The Austro-Hungarian Government. But they several years ago proposed to Russia that the Treaty should be altered, and that the neutrality of the Black Sea should be abandoned; and it is in this state of things that the right hon. Gentleman finds it necessary to introduce to-night the polemics of the case before the House of Commons, and to show how wrong we were not to go to war single-handed in order to force on Russia the permanent contraction of her rights of sovereignty over a portion of her territory. I am perfectly content to leave to the House and to the country the judgment on that portion of the question; and I think I have shown in some degree what would have been our predicament if, adopting the doctrines of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to guarantees, we had endeavoured to make the guarantee to Prussia. With regard to the general question of the guarantee which the right hon. Gentleman says I repudiated last year, I used no such expression. I declined to be bound by the stringent application of the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, a doctrine which he is himself obliged to overturn to-night. I have shown that there are circumstances which I think brings the greatest weight to bear upon the nature of the guarantee—namely, the total change that has taken place in regard to the constitution of Germany, and the vast extension and power of the territorial sovereignty of Prussia. The right hon. Gentleman would cut up the guarantee by the roots. It would be most ungrateful on my part if I were to pursue his position of the subject into further analysis; but the right hon. Gentleman has not done with us, and I have not done with his argument, for the point of his charge was this—that our diplomatic weakness was traceable to our military weakness, and our military weakness was traceable in errors, in harum-scarum Budgets; and our harum-scarum Budgets were ultimately referable to rash rhetoric in Lancashire. I think the House will agree that it would not be respectful, either to the right hon. Gentleman, or to the House itself, if I were not to test, in some degree, these rather grave allegations which he has made. Having raised to its climax his argument of interference, the right hon. Gentleman said, here I should be met with the observation “That’s all very well—but we have no armaments.” Now, let us test the question, whether there were armaments or not. This is a relative term. There are a certain number of Gentlemen in this House who will contend that we have no armaments—that is, we have not sufficient armaments until the whole population of military years are armed—not the whole population which occupies the Benches of this House to which I belong, but that nothing short of an armed nation can be considered a nation properly prepared with the means of defence. I disclaim that standard; and certainly the right hon. Gentleman has not appealed to it. Now, what standard have we to go by? It is quite obvious. The right hon. Gentleman said that we had no armaments, because we had dissolved or disbanded regiments, and that we had damaged, curtailed, and contracted the armaments of the nation in pursuit of the frivolous purpose of affording some fiscal relief to the people. Well, so far as I am aware, every word I spoke in Lancashire on the subject of economy I adhere to. The right hon. Gentleman said that we reduced and enfeebled the armaments of the country, and that we had no armaments to support our diplomacy. I will try a mode of testing this by reference to former years. I will take the armaments of last year, when the right hon. Gentleman said we had no armaments, or—for he changed the phrase—only “attenuated armaments,” and probably the latter is the idea which the right hon. Gentleman, in the use of his copious vocabulary, intended by preference to convey. I have often known the right hon. Gentleman to be great in this House on the subject of armaments, and the last time he so displayed himself he was not deploring “attenuated” armaments, but denouncing “bloated armaments;” and it will be found curious to illustrate by the familiar test of arithmetic what are his notions with respect to “attenuated armaments,” and what they are with respect to “bloated armaments.” There may be bloated armaments either by sea or by land; but I am not going to enter into the naval part of the case, and for the reason that during the discussion of last summer, when the policy of the Government was questioned with respect to military matters, admissions were frankly made by many of the objectors—some of them sitting on the Opposition Benches—that we had a powerful and efficient fleet. In 1862, however, the armaments of the country had, according to the right hon. Gentleman, reached such portentous dimensions that he was obliged to express his indignation at them, and denounced them as “bloated armaments.” In that year the whole of the regular force available for home service amounted to 92,270 men, according to the Estimates. That, then, was a “bloated armament.” In 1870 the force at home, on the Estimates of the regular Army was 89,051; and yet the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the 92,000 men as a bloated armament, and of the 89,000 as an attenuated armament, the difference between the two amounts being only about 3,000. It must also be recollected that in the days of the bloated armament of 92,000 men we had no reserve—not a man to bless ourselves with—but in the days of the attenuated armament of 89,000 men we had a reserve of more than 20,000 men, liable to serve abroad. Then the right hon. Gentleman says we disbanded veterans. What we did was this—we disbanded the men who were uselessly employed, in order that we might depend upon men who should be usefully employed, and that is the principle of economy, that is the principle of rash rhetoric in Lancashire, and that is the principle which my right hon. Friend near me (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) is said to have adopted in his “harum-scarum Budgets,” by which the country has received a remission of taxation, amounting to more than £4,000,000 or £5,000,000. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Eight millions.] At any rate, I hope that we have effectually stopped the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman upon the subject of attenuated armaments. But it may be as well to give the figures for 1868, when the armaments, being under the charge of the right hon. Gentleman, would, of course, be proper armaments, for I find that, whereas there was an attenuated army in 1870, available for home defence, amounting to 89,000, in 1868 the proper and sufficient number was 87,500. Nor is that the whole of the case, because the reserves were then comparatively in their infancy, and while in 1868 they amounted to only 3,500, in 1870 they numbered 20,000. Now, I ask the House—I ask Gentlemen in whatever part of the House they may sit—I think I may even ask the right hon. Gentleman himself—what sort of a case he has made out upon the question of attenuated armaments, and consequent impotence to support the just influence of England? I depart entirely now from the polemical portion of the case, though, of course, it is in the discretion of other Gentlemen to pursue it to any extent they may think fit. It is natural and right that the right hon. Gentleman should state his objections as important points affecting the conduct of the Government, especially as such a statement reaches over the Recess, and it is also right that we should defend our conduct. There is very little more to say before I sit down. With the right hon. Gentleman I feel there are other considerations which rise much above these, even although they be not void of importance. I cannot say that I have been greatly impressed with what has been said with regard to the special dangers to this country involved in the present aspect of affairs; but I am deeply impressed with the melancholy and doubtful character of the prospects which hang before Europe. I know that our minds have been to a certain extent relieved by the armistice which has been accomplished within the last few days. Let us hope it may be renewed if necessary. Let us hope that the transactions which occur within it may be transactions of a nature to lead to a durable peace. But I think it would be rash on our part to indulge in too sanguine anticipations. Hope for peace we may; but we must not at present reckon too confidently upon the fulfilment of our hopes. If we look forward to the future, no doubt it is necessary for us to consider what is the position of this country with reference to Europe at large; and for my own part, separating the position of this country, ideally and for purposes of argument, for a moment from that of Europe, I cannot but feel that we have some reason to be thankful—thankful for the position of the country, and thankful for the union of the people, to which the right hon. Gentleman to-night referred, and in many respects has rendered such emphatic and handsome testimony. But I should probably find the right hon. Gentleman agreeing with me—or, using more respectful language, I should find myself agreeing with the right hon. Gentleman—that, while it is a mistake for us ever to be laboriously endeavouring to show that we are in danger, and that somebody or other is meditating mischief against us, it would be, on the other hand, a gross error to lay down doctrines of non-interference in the manner of a rigid formula. I am now speaking in my own individual capacity, and I do not wish in any way to bind my Colleagues in what may fall from me. I should not wish to bind any other person to the feeling that I myself entertain of the power, the security, and the independence of this country, come what may. But I admit, and am the first to assert that, whatever be that security, power, and independence, we have no right to wrap ourselves up in an absolute and selfish isolation. We have a history, we have traditions, we have living, constant, perpetual, multiplied intercourse and contact with every people in Europe. We should be unworthy of the recollections of our past, unworthy of our hopes of the future, unworthy of the greatness of the present, if we disowned the obligations which arise out of these relations to others more liable to suffer than ourselves. Sympathy and fellow-feeling in Europe, with the duties which arise from sympathy and fellow-feeling, never can be forgotten in this country, and I fully admit that the exercise of these duties is not to be separated from the consideration of the state of your military power and the efficiency of your armaments; while I venture to think we are not open to the charges of the right hon. Gentleman in this respect. Admitting this, I also feel that in this country our great desire is to see from year to year more and more ascendancy given to moral over material forces. Perhaps in that respect during our lifetime many of us may have been too sanguine. Perhaps at this moment some of us may, on the contrary, be too desponding. But I venture to say that probably the year upon which we have lately entered will establish much, and confirm much that is now doubtful and open to dispute with respect to what Europe has to hope in the future, and what Europe has to fear from the relations between moral and material forces. Of course, what we mean when we speak of moral and material forces is not the mere change from one epithet to another of a different character. When we speak of material forces we mean overpowering violence, and by moral forces we mean that rule of right which is the protection of all peoples. I trust we shall never be led into the error of supposing that we improve our own condition in the face of Europe by setting up theories of imaginary interests which we do not possess, or which if we do possess them, are not exposed to danger. Here I claim the liberty of criticizing the historical statement adopted by the right hon. Gentleman from Earl Russell, with regard to States, by the example of which it is said we should take warning, and which have perished not through any fault of their own, but because other nations envied them their happiness and prosperity. I have asked what these States are, and have not been able to obtain an answer. The right hon. Gentleman is the first person bold enough to attempt an answer, and he cites the instance of Venice and the League of Cambrai. Now, though Venice there had a good case, it was certainly not one of entire abstinence, as far as she was concerned, from the policy of violence and aggression. The League of Cambrai came and went, and Venice, which had lived long before it, survived the League of Cambrai, succeeded against the combination, and it therefore does not form an illustration in support of the doctrine which has been taken over by the right hon. Gentleman from my noble Friend Lord Russell, and which, I think, is wanting in historical foundation. For my own part, I am persuaded that a just, a moderate, and practical view of our national security, combined with those careful preparations which we ought to make for the efficiency of our military system, is the best policy for ourselves and the best policy for others, and that by the avoidance of all fantastic theories—whether theories of security and isolation or of alarm—we shall most safely discharge our duty both to ourselves and others. For the present, I do not enter into the question of military preparation, because, as my right hon. Friend has shown, within seven days the House will be fully possessed of the views of the Government, and it would, therefore, be obviously impossible to discuss a matter of this kind with satisfaction upon the present occasion. Perhaps I ought to state that, while we have found it our duty, as has been stated in the gracious Speech from the Throne, to refrain from whatever might savour of the appearance of impertinent interference or whatever might justly diminish any claim we might have on the goodwill and attention of the two great belligerent Powers, we have certainly redeemed by acts the pledges we gave of perpetual and vigilant watchfulness over all the turns and movements both of policy and of war. We began, as the House knows, by endeavouring to procure the withdrawal of the candidature of Prince Hohenzollern; and in that endeavour, acting in concurrence with others, we were successful. We then ventured to disapprove the demand made by France upon the King of Prussia (now the Emperor of Germany) for a prospective engagement; and there it was our misfortune to fail. We then appealed to the Treaty of 1856, and endeavoured, in a practical form, to set up the wise doctrine that the disputes of States ought to be referred to some competent tribunal for settlement. But we did not obtain a hearing. After the war broke out many questions still arose—scarcely a week or a fortnight, indeed, passed without them—upon which we had to consider nice matters for intervention,—I mean intervention by request or expostulation. I need hardly say that all we have done has been done with a perfect and absolute impartiality. The first appeal addressed to us in the course of the war was made by Germany with a view to induce us to favour to the utmost of our power arrangements, not perhaps strictly justifiable upon the bare ground of neutral obligation, for the transit of wounded soldiers through the territory of Luxemburg. Of course we could do nothing to extend unduly the rights of neutrals or disparage their obligations. This was an appeal in the name of humanity, and therefore we ourselves waived every objection to the transit of the wounded, and did all we could to recommend the adoption of a similar course to other Powers. It was declined at the time; but such has been the force of circumstances, and the overpowering necessity arising during the gigantic operations of the war, that, from what I have read in public journals, that has been done in the interests of Germany and France for which we tried to procure a sanction at the earliest period, and soldiers wounded in action have been transported across neutral territory. As has been stated in the Speech, we have endeavoured to bring the parties together. I shall not dwell on the efforts which we made to bring about the conferences which resulted in the meeting between Count Bismarck and M. Jules Favre, or that which was held with M. Thiers. We did, perhaps, stretch a point, but in language so respectful that no objection could be taken, in expressing an earnest desire—thus only making ourselves the mouthpiece of universal humanity—that the extreme measure of bombardment should not be had recourse to against a magnificent and beautiful city. And, perhaps, when we take into account the great severity by which the war has been characterized, we have less to lament with respect to this point than with regard to many other subjects, notwithstanding that a great deal of alarm and exasperation was created. We ventured, I may add, to favour, so far as we might in friendly communication with the Government of Defence in France, those plans for calling together an Assembly fully authorized to represent the nation, which are only now about to reach their consummation. We ventured to point out that little good was likely to arise from the multiplication of abstract declarations with reference to the terms of peace, as they would probably operate rather in the way of obstacle than the contrary. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) endeavoured, with the utmost persistence, to cause that France should be represented in the Conference which is now sitting in London, and it is matter of great regret to us that this endeavour has failed; and lastly, perhaps, I may say in regard to political measures, we ventured to suggest to the Government of Germany that it would be conducive to the general welfare if they found themselves in a condition to make known to the world what were the terms of peace which they deemed to be required, having regard to the honour and safety of their country. There remains but one other measure which we have taken, in which we, perhaps, have assumed a responsibility that may render it necessary that we should come to Parliament to give it its final authority. I do not know how that may be; but we were of opinion that we should be giving effect to the feeling of this country and performing a duty if, at a critical moment, when we were just told that in Paris there was danger of extensive famine from the absolute want of food, we offered to place at the disposal of the two Governments on their joint representation, for the purpose of immediate relief, whatever stores we had in the victualling yards of the country. It was not our fault—it was, I believe, the fault of no one—but I have to regret sincerely that it was only last night we received anything which we could consider as a joint answer to our offer, and when I inform the House of this circumstance, it will not, I think, be regarded as discreditable to the condition of the public Departments that, as I understand, three vessels took their departure for France with provisions in the middle of the day. I may add that it is our duty and desire to continue to act in a similar spirit. It is impossible to divest ourselves of the deepest interest in the events which are now going on on the Continent, and, independently of the measures to which I have specially referred, we have carefully reserved to ourselves all along full liberty of action. We have at no time subscribed to the doctrine that a war between two belligerents is the concern of those two belligerents exclusively. It is, no doubt, their concern in the first instance, and, with respect to it, they have a primary authority; but the effects of such a war are not and cannot be confined to them. The time may come—I do not say it will come; I hope it may not come—when the need may exist for some expression of the general sentiment of the neutral Powers on questions which may become of deep practical issue. If that need does arise, I feel perfectly satisfied that such an expression of neutral opinion, apart from all imputations of selfish interest, in claiming for itself only to be the living utterance of the voice of civilized mankind, would have a genial, kindly, and beneficial influence in bringing about the realization of a satisfactory settlement between the contending parties. And I am sure that, although the right hon. Gentleman opposite and myself have broken lances to-night across this Table, he will agree with me that there is no reason why all parties in this House, and in the House of Lords, should not unite in supporting the Government in any measure they may take with the view of preventing human suffering in this formidable war.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I desire, before this debate closes, to say a few words with reference to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. I do not believe that there is reason for the abject alarm on account of the interests of this country which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed, although, on account of the critical state of affairs upon the Continent, I believe that there is reason for prompt exertion. The right hon. Gentleman congratulated the Prime Minister on his triumph in the disestablishment of the Irish Church. [“Hear, hear!”] I am not surprised that hon. Gentlemen opposite should express their satisfaction at finding that, according to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, there is to be no opposition from the Conservative party, as a party, to the adoption of the measures which they advocate. I suppose that this will be likewise the case with respect to the abolition of the University Tests and the Ballot, which were honestly advocated by the Secunder of the Address, the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr.

Morley, especially the abolition of the tests in the Universities, which the hon. Member advocated in the sense of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall.) Now, I know that I speak not only the opinions of my own constituents, but those of thousands—nay, hundreds of thousands—of educated men, when I object to these measures on constitutional grounds; while, as regards these measures, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire at once accepts in principle the programme of the Government and of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Such conduct on the part of the right hon. Gentleman—and he spoke emphatically as the organ of the Conservative party in this House—such conduct is destructive of the Conservative party in the country, for the right hon. Gentleman declared his full acceptance not only of the commercial policy called free trade, which had its source among hon. Gentlemen opposite, but, further, his full acceptance of the doctrine of religious equality, as held by hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House. I believe, Sir, that it is advantageous to the constitution of this country, and for the conduct of business in this House, that there should be two parties—one supporting the Government, the others represented by the Opposition in this House—so long as there is in this country an honest and distinct difference of opinion on general politics. I, therefore, deprecate the announcement of submission on the questions of internal policy, to which I have alluded, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire; such conduct on his part is destructive of the Conservative party. Allusion has been made to the letter, written by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, promising the support of the Government to the spiritual authority of the Pope. I understand that a Notice has been given by some hon. Member on this subject. I am glad of this, and that we shall have a specific discussion of this subject. It does seem to me lamentable and inconsistent with the views upon which many hon. Gentlemen opposite supported the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister should attempt to establish the spiritual authority of the Pope everywhere, and in Ireland especially, after he has done all he can to disestablish the spiritual authority of the Protestant Church in Ireland. I was unwilling, Sir, that this debate should close without my entering this emphatic protest against the abandonment of principles to which I have been long attached.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that the following passage with reference to the Army appeared in Her Majesty's Speech:—

"The lessons of military experience afforded by the present war have been numerous and important. The time appears appropriate for turning such lessons to account."

But he looked in vain to find any allusion to the confusion which existed at present in the administration of the Admiralty, or to the enormous deficiencies in the material of our naval force, in the number and quality of our vessels, and in the men required for the defence of the country. As his noble Friend the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) had given Notice that he would early in March call attention to the loss of Her Majesty's ship Captain, he would only say now that it was a very extraordinary thing that the confusion which existed at the Admiralty—the First Lord being absent for the sake of his health, and there being no one in his place—should not have been alluded to in Her Majesty's Speech.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed, to draw up an Address to be presented to Her Majesty upon the said Resolution:—Mr. JOHN HAMILTON, Mr. MORLEY, Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. SECRETARY BRUCE, Mr. SECRETARY CARDWELL, Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Mr. AYTON, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. STANFELD, Viscount ENFIELD, Mr. KEATON-BULL-HUGHESSE, Mr. MONSELL, The JUDGE ADVOCATE, Mr. GLYN, and Mr. ADAM, or any Five of them:—To withdraw immediately:—Queen's Speech referred.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. Speaker informed the House, that he had received from the Judges selected, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the trial of Election Petitions, Certificates and Reports relating to the Elections for the Borough of Brecon; for the Borough of Shrewsbury; for the City of Norwich. And the same were severally read.

Brecon Borough Election.—Certificate of Mr. Justice Byles.—In the matter of the Petition relating to the last Election of a Member of Parliament for the Borough of Brecon. That the Respondent James Price William Gwynne Holford was duly elected and returned at the said Election.

Shrewsbury Borough Election.—Certificate of Mr. Justice Channell.—In the matter of the Petition relating to the last Election of a Member of Parliament for the Borough of Shrewsbury. That Douglas Straight, esquire, was duly elected and returned at the said Election.

Norwich City Election.—Certificate of Mr. Justice Keating.—In the matter of a Petition in which Gardener Christopher Stevens was Petitioner; and Jacob Henry Tillett was Respondent. That the said Jacob Henry Tillett was not duly returned or elected to serve in Parliament for the said City of Norwich. That the Election of the said Jacob Henry Tillett for the City of Norwich was a void Election. [And other facts found.]

after Nine o'clock.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS—
MR. MONSELL'S SPEECH AT LIMERICK.
EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE desired permission to read to their Lordships a note which he had received from the Postmaster General. The note was as follows:—

"My dear Granville,—The Duke of Richmond is reported to have attributed to me last night the statement 'that it was the intention of the Government to supplement the Land Act of last Session by another measure in the course of a couple of years.' Will you kindly take the trouble to say for me that I never made any such statement? What I said was—to repeat a promise made by C. Fortescue in the House of Commons with reference to labourers' dwellings—that a measure for improving them would probably be introduced in the course of the next two years.

"I am, yours sincerely, W. MONSELL."

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT—PEERS.
QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, their Lordships were probably aware that by a recent decision Members of the House were liable to be adjudged bankrupt. He wished to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if he has considered whether any legislation is advisable in respect of any Peers adjudged bankrupt?

EARL GRANVILLE said, the matter had not escaped the attention of the Government. There was, he believed, a feeling on both sides the House that it was inconsistent with their dignity that Peers in the painful position referred to should sit and vote, and that some action should be taken in the matter. The Lord Chancellor had a measure under consideration, and he hoped the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), who, he believed, had paid some attention to the matter, would be kind enough to communicate with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack on the subject. He thought it desirable that a measure should be brought in at an early date.

LORD WESTBURY asked whether it was proposed to exempt Peers from the operation of the Bankruptcy Act, or whether it was proposed to follow the rule of the House of Commons, and to resolve that during bankruptcy a Peer should not be capable of sitting and voting in the House? In the latter case no legislation would be necessary, as it could be done simply by a Resolution.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that it was not proposed to alter the law with regard to the liability of a Peer to become bankrupt. The contemplated measure would simply affect his position in the House in the event of his being so adjudged. He believed it was the opinion of those who had considered the subject that a Resolution would not be sufficient. There were, moreover, some extraordinary anomalies in this matter with reference to Members of the House of Commons, and the Government would endeavour to correct these, at the same time that they sought to provide for the case of bankrupt Peers.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

EARL GRANVILLE moved that the Viscount Eversley be appointed to take the Chair in the Committees of the Whole House in the absence of the Lord Redesdale from illness.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS LOUISE.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

Delivered by the Earl Granville, and read by the Lord Chancellor as follows :

VICTORIA R.,

Her Majesty relies upon the cordial interest which the House of Lords has expressed in the approaching marriage between the Princess Louise and the Marquess of Lorne :

The numerous proofs which the Queen has received of their loyalty to Her Throne, and of their attachment to Her Person and Family, lead Her to hope that they will make such provision for the Princess Louise, with a view to the proposed marriage, as may be suitable to the dignity of the Crown :

Ordered, That the said Message be taken into consideration on Monday next.

THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Papers relating to the Conference which are to be laid upon the Table will contain all Communications received by Her Majesty's Government in reference to proposed action on the part of other Powers consequent upon the Circular Note of Prince Gortschakoff ?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, that all Papers in connection with the hon. Baronet's Question which could be published without detriment to the public interests would be included in the documents to be presented to Parliament. Two sets of Papers in relation to that subject and the Franco-Prussian War had been just laid upon the Table.

NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—QUESTION

MR. G. B. GREGORY asked the First Commissioner of Works, What was the cause of the delay in commencing the building of the New Courts of Justice ?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, he was not surprised at the Question of the hon. Gentleman, considering the interest he had taken in the subject, and the extraordinary statements which had been persistently repeated during the Recess—that in consequence of his (Mr. Ayrton's) dislike and opposition to the present scheme for building the new Law Courts, he had done his best to prevent the commencement of the work. The project for the erection of the building was submitted to the House by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) six years ago. The proposition was that the Government should purchase the site at a cost of £750,000, and should erect the new Courts of Justice upon it, at a cost of a similar sum. Commissioners were appointed to give their sanction to the details of the project, and to give their guarantee to the House that the expenditure on the whole should not exceed £1,500,000. When that plan was brought before the House he (Mr. Ayrton) gave it his earnest support, and urged the House to carry it into effect at the earliest possible period. But the Commissioners, instead of acting in conformity with the statute, after giving the guarantee required, proceeded to entertain a project which resulted in their adopting a scheme, which would involve an expenditure of £3,250,000, in place of the sum originally contemplated. That scheme was found to a certain extent matured when Her Majesty's present Government succeeded to Office; but, in consequence of the discussions which were then raised, nothing was done for a year: and it was not until the Christmas before last that he was requested to take steps to induce the Commissioners, and all parties concerned, to adopt some plan to give effect to the intentions which Parliament had expressed in the Act they had passed. Now, it would have been almost easier to have begun de novo than to have reduced the scheme from the dimensions of £3,250,000 to which it had swollen—and in the meanwhile the purchases of land had expanded to £900,000—to its original dimensions of £1,500,000: but, after going into all the details, they were able to bring the project for the building itself within the original compass. Still difficulties arose in reference to the construction, which were so serious that as early as March he (Mr. Ayrton) suggested to the architect that he must radically change his plan if he were to conform to the wishes of Parliament. The architect exerted all his skill and ingenuity to carry out his own design; but in July he came to the conclusion that it would be better to take the course which he (Mr. Ayrton) had suggested months before, and prepared a revised plan. In August last the Commissioners signed their Report approving of the revised plan, and it was sent to him from the Treasury with the request that he would take the necessary steps to carry it into effect. The first question he had to consider was what was to be the duty of the architect, who would be responsible to the Government and to Parliament that the plan would be carried out for the sum that Parliament had thought fit to provide. It was not until the end of September that a formal contract was made with the architect, clearly defining his duties and his relations to the Office of Works; and directions were immediately thereon given to prepare a sketch plan. The architect stated that it was impossible to do that before the 1st January last, and that working plans could not be prepared before the 1st July. In order that no delay should take place in proceeding with the work, he (Mr. Ayrton) requested the architect to prepare immediately specifications in order to lay in the foundation, and to get the ground ready for the superstructure. At the end of November, while the sketch plan was in progress, the specifications were sent in, and tenders for this part of the work were invited, on the condition that it should be completed by September next. It required some time for the builders to ascertain what was the work for which tenders were asked; but as soon as they were aware of the nature and extent of the work, they protested against the shortness of time allowed them for its completion. In consequence the time was extended from the 1st September to 1st February, when the foundation would be completed. He did not think that this would lead to any delay in the erection of the building, because in the meantime all the working drawings and preliminary steps for the superstructure would be going on. The contractors were to go on pari passu with the preparation of the working plans and drawings, so that the moment the foundations were completed they would be in a position to ask for tenders for the whole work. So desirous were the Government to have the work carried out properly and promptly, that notice had been given for the purchase of additional land that would be required. The result would be that—apart from the additional expense in the purchase of land, which could not be avoided—the building would be erected for the sum originally proposed—namely, £750,000, and he ventured to assert that it would be a more useful building, and better in every respect, than it would have been if the vast expenditure which the Government had checked had been incurred.

THE BLACK SEA CONFERENCE — REFUSAL OF A SAFE CONDUCT TO THE FRENCH PLENIPOTENTIARY.

QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the case that the Prussian authorities, at the instance of the English Government, promised a safe conduct to a French Plenipotentiary to attend the Conference, and after having done so refused to grant the safe conduct; and if such has been the case, what course has been taken by Her Majesty's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: The course of the transactions with respect to the safe conduct for the Foreign Minister of the Defence Government of France has been somewhat minute and difficult to follow, and I will not attempt to state, in answer to my hon. Friend, the whole of the details. But as he has raised the question, and as there is, perhaps, a notion abroad that there has been something like a breach of faith, I will state enough to give, I think, a fair view of the matter. In the first place, a request was made on the 27th of November, through M. Tissot, the French Chargé d'Affaires, that a safe conduct might be afforded to M. Jules Favre through the Prussian lines in order to allow of his attending the Conference on Eastern affairs in London. This request was forwarded by Lord Granville through the kind intervention of Count Bernstorff, the German Ambassador. The answer received from Count Bismarck was that a safe conduct was at M. Jules Favre's disposal, but that it must be sent for by M. Favre—and the reason he gave for that peculiar method of proceeding was that a flag of truce sent in by the Germans had been fired upon by the French. Whether this statement is erroneous or not we need not stay to inquire; but it was the reason given why M. Favre must send for the safe conduct. The safe conduct was not sent for at that time; but on the 13th of January M. Jules Favre applied himself to Count Bismarck, and the answer given was that the application should not be made to him (Count Bismarck), but to the German military authorities. As late as the 18th of January Mr. Odo Russell wrote to Lord Granville, stating that no difficulty had been made in the matter on the part of the military authorities or by Count Bismarck, and that the French Minister had only to apply for, in order to receive, the safe conduct. But on the 22nd of January, when the bombardment of Paris had begun, the military authorities of the German army declared that no one could be allowed to enter or leave Paris during the period of the bombardment; and that, no doubt, is the circumstance which may have been construed by some into an abrupt refusal on the part of the Germans of that which had been previously conceded. No doubt it was a refusal; but it was a refusal with a reason assigned: and at the same time as the German authorities came to that conclusion M. Favre himself on the very next day—for it was on the 23rd of January—wrote to say that there were various reasons, which he would not state in detail, irrespective altogether of this conclusion of the Germans, which would prevent him from absenting himself from Paris during circumstances so critical as those which at that time had arisen. With respect to the proceedings of Lord Granville in this matter, the endeavours we have made to procure the presence of a French representative at the Conference will appear quite clearly in the Papers which have been laid upon the Table, and which I hope will be very shortly in the hands of Members.

LICENSING BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When it is his intention to bring forward his Bill on the Licensing of Houses for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he was unable at present to fix a day for introducing his promised Bill on the subject; but he assured his hon. Friend that he would bring it forward as soon as he had a fair opportunity of proceeding with it continuously. He might add that it was the full intention of the Government to get the Bill passed into law during the present Session.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—THE WAR—RE-VICTUALLING OF PARIS.

QUESTION.

MR. BROWN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he is in a condition to give any information as to what assistance has been rendered by Her Majesty's Government from available stores in the re-victualling of Paris?

MR. BAXTER: In reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to say that late on Wednesday evening the Admiralty received from the Foreign Office a request that such assistance as could be provided from the Government stores for the re-victualling of Paris should be sent off without delay. Our stock of provisions at present in the victualling yards is so large that 2,500 tons, amounting in value to nearly £50,000, can be spared for Paris without the slightest inconvenience to the naval service. In anticipation of such a demand probably being made, we had set apart large quantities of flour, biscuit, salt pork, salt beef, preserved beef, soup, essence of beef, and boiled mutton in readiness for shipment at a moment's notice; and the vessels to convey the stores were also waiting. Immediately on the receipt of the communication from the Foreign Office, telegraphic orders were sent to the various ports to begin to load the ships at daylight yesterday. I have to inform the House that the Pelter left Portsmouth, the Buffalo Deptford, and the Helicon Devonport, yesterday afternoon, all for Dieppe. The Tamar sails from Devonport and the Buzzard from Deptford to-day, both for Havre; and the Valorous and Lord Panmure for the same port will leave to-morrow. It will be a consolation to the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire and those who believe with him that our stores are in such a lamentable condition to know that, if necessary, we could afford at least 1,000 tons more.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Report of Address brought up, and read.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE desired to call attention to one point which had been omitted from the most able and interesting speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire in the course of the debate so abruptly terminated yesterday. He alluded to the subject referred to by Her Majesty when She expressed a hope that the armistice

"May result in a Peace compatible, for the two great and brave nations involved, with security and with honour, and likely therefore to command the approval of Europe, and to give reasonable hopes of a long duration."

He wished in the first place to ask for some explanation from Her Majesty's Government as to the course they intended to adopt in regard to the impending negotiations. Unfortunately, a very general feeling of dissatisfaction prevailed throughout the country at the want of sympathy shown by Her Majesty's Government in respect of the great misfortune of our old friends and allies. ["No, no!"] That was a prevalent opinion, and it was justified by some of the expressions used by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench in addressing their constituents. Of course he did not allude to the Prime Minister, who had not had an opportunity of visiting his constituents; but he had been surprised and grieved to see the spirit of exultation at the misfortunes of France, and the want of sympathy with the people of that unhappy country, exhibited in the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in his speech at Paisley. ["No, no!"] Those who would refer to the right hon. Gentleman's speech would find that he exulted over the calamities of France, because, he said, the result would be a greater confidence in England, because France in her prostrate condition would be less able to trouble this country. He was not quoting the right hon. Gentleman's precise words, but that was the tendency of his remarks. Now, he was quite ready to admit that while the war continued, whatever might be the feelings and sympathies of Her Majesty's Government, it was very difficult for them to interfere; in the first place, because, in the state of our naval and military preparations, our interference would not have been attended with much result. But now that the war had terminated, or was at least suspended, and the period for negotiations was at hand, the position of Her Majesty's Government had entirely changed, and he wished to urge upon them the necessity of attaching due importance to those negotiations. It could not be supposed that this country was uninterested in the new settlement of the map of Europe. In that very able article in a celebrated review which had become famous from having been attributed to a most important personage, and which might be described as "the happy-England and silver-streak article," there was a very strong passage as to the result of German unity as affecting Russia, Turkey, and the great Slavonian races. That showed that whoever wrote that article felt the importance of the reconstruction of the map of Europe in its bearing upon the interests of Europe. He hoped, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government would state to the House their views with respect to some of the rumours current as to the probable terms of peace. M. Prevost-Paradol—alas! now no more—when German unity was mooted in 1866, referring to what compensation France could have for that change, said there was but one course that France could take, and that was to fight, sword in hand, against German unity to the last gasp. He maintained, therefore, that they were now at the turning point of that momentous controversy, and that the greatest responsibility would rest upon Her Majesty's Government—perhaps within the next few days—if the terms of peace entered into were not those which would really give security to Europe. Some persons said that, however powerful Prussia might become, she would never do us any harm; but these tremendous changes must seriously affect the whole Continent. It was after the capitulation of Sedan that they had the Russian Note repudiating the Treaty of 1856; they had also seen mooted in a German paper the notion of the annexation of Denmark to Germany; and he should not be surprised if, in the course of time, the annexation of Belgium should likewise be suggested. Before the House, therefore, came to any question as to our armaments, they ought first to consider whether or not in future we were to maintain our treaty obligations. For himself, he felt much disheartened by what fell from the Prime Minister last night in speaking of that most important Treaty which it cost this country so much blood and treasure to secure—the Treaty of Paris of 1856. He was perfectly astonished to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that from the first, and as far back as 1855, he had always thought the clause of that Treaty preventing Russia from having a fleet in the Black Sea was unjust. ["No!"] Well, he had so understood the right hon. Gentleman, who also said that Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon were under the same impression. ["No!"] He should be glad to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of correcting him. The right hon. Gentleman went on to state that Austria and other signatories of the Treaty had evinced a disposition to recede from that condition. If that was really so, how was it that when the Russian Note appeared it created panic and consternation in everybody's mind? And why did Lord Granville write that very able and spirited despatch, which was quite unmeaning if—as he understood from the Prime Minister's speech—they intended to give up that most important and vital part of the Treaty? What were the real facts of the case? So important was that clause of the Treaty that in 1855 the Conference of Vienna was broken up on that very point. In February there was an armistice; and for 11 months this country went on expending its blood and treasure in the Crimea for that very point and no other. Were they to be told, then, 14 years afterwards, that the matter was wholly unimportant and indifferent to this country? Having himself had some communication with St. Petersburg, he was led to believe that if our Government had only stuck to Lord Granville's despatch and insisted on the withdrawal of the Russian Note, that Note would have been withdrawn. But the moment they talked of a Conference it was known that the result would be what the right hon. Gentleman indicated last night—namely, that they were going to give up everything for which they had made such costly sacrifices. What confidence, then, was to be placed in treaty obligations? If the solemn stipulations regarding the neutralization of the Black Sea were to be set aside, how was anybody to feel certain that existing treaty obligations in respect to Belgium or other States would not be given up also? Before considering the question of armaments, then, it was most important to decide what they wanted to have armaments for—whether they meant to uphold the faith of treaties, or whether they would confine their policy merely to the defence of these islands, shutting themselves up in insular selfishness, not even caring for their own Colonies, and taking no interest whatever in events passing on the other side of the "silver streak of sea." If they were, indeed, to adopt a policy of isolation, then they would not require to increase their armaments. And here he could not help remarking on the inconsistency of the Government. If they thought the country now was really as safe as it was before the war, and that there was no danger, why did they propose to strengthen their defensive establishments? If they did not intend in future to take any interest in foreign affairs, he was at a loss to understand why they were going to add to the Army at all. But, on the other hand, he felt sure that if they intended to maintain the dignity of the country in the face of the world and to play their part in the affairs of Europe, they did require a greater force than they now possessed.

But they also required that the Government should have a distinct, clear, and avowed policy—that it should tell Europe plainly what it intended to do, and, having thus declared its intention, should firmly adhere to it. Unless this country was prepared to maintain its position in the face of Europe it would sink into a third or fourth-rate Power. In his opinion the Government were bound to declare to the House the course of policy they intended to pursue with reference to the approaching negotiations. The right hon. Gentleman would, in all probability, urge the necessity of waiting before such a declaration should be made. But the House had waited. They waited last Session for such a declaration, and it was the opinion of many eminent politicians that if the House of Commons had been allowed to speak out frankly last Session on the subject the war would have been prevented altogether. Such a declaration of opinion on the part of that House would have greatly influenced the mind of the then Emperor of the French, who, he must say, had been most ungenerously treated by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and his Friends. If the right hon. Gentleman did not choose to go to his constituents he had had ample opportunity at the Mansion House and elsewhere to express sympathy with the misfortunes of an ancient and a faithful ally. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not thought fit to adopt such a course. The present condition of affairs was unsatisfactory, but something, at least, would have been achieved if the right hon. Gentleman could be induced to make a declaration to the House such as he asked for.

MR. GILPIN said, he had not intended to take part in this debate, which appeared to be a continuance of the discussion which occurred last evening. It was to be regretted that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had not taken the opportunity of making his statement last night, when the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was fresh in the memory of all. He took the liberty of asking the hon. Member upon what grounds he formed his estimate of the opinion of the country with reference to the policy that had been pursued by the Government in relation to foreign affairs. Had the hon. Member attended one public meeting where a thousand persons fairly called together had been present, in which he had been able to carry a resolution supporting the opinions which he had expressed to the House that night? He himself (Mr. Gilpin) had been present at four or five meetings within the last few months, at which the assembled thousands of working men had unanimously passed resolutions in favour of the policy of the Government. He joined issue with the hon. Member when he said that Her Majesty's Government—of whom the hon. Member was not more independent than himself—had been charged by the public with indifference or supineness with respect to the sufferings endured on the other side of the Channel. The hon. Member spoke of the indifference with which the Government had regarded the violation of treaties by certain Continental Powers, and yet in the same breath he blamed them for not taking steps to express sympathy with the misfortunes of a ruler for the expulsion of whose dynasty from the throne of France this country had engaged in the war that terminated in 1815, it being one of the stipulations of the Treaty entered into in that year that no Napoleon should ever sit upon the throne of France. It was extraordinary that the hon. Member should overlook the fact that that Treaty had been torn into shreds, while he expressed such unbounded surprise that another Treaty had been disregarded. The hon. Member had told the House that he had received communications from St. Petersburg. Perhaps the senders of those communications had mistaken the address of the Foreign Office. He had himself not had the advantage of receiving such private communications; but judging from the public communications from St. Petersburg, and from all he was able to learn from the Press of the different countries of Europe, he believed that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in this matter had not only received the sanction of the people of those countries, but had met with the approval of even the parties directly concerned. The hon. Member opposite had referred to the subject of the increase in our armaments—a subject which would be brought under the consideration of the House before long, and had remarked that such increase would not be necessary if we intended to be selfish, and to rely for our security upon the silver streak of sea. They had been justly told the Government did not pursue so selfish a policy; but on behalf of thousands, he (Mr. Gilpin) wished to state that he would be content with an increase of our armaments only on the condition that there was no increase in the expenditure upon those forces. Could our armaments be rendered more efficient at their present cost the country would approve of changes by which such a result might be obtained; but if the Government meant that they were going to have armaments that should entitle this country to meddle in foreign quarrels, and to dictate to a country whether it should constitute itself a Republic, or should accept such and such a king, let this country be ever so rich, it would be unable to keep up the armaments necessary for that purpose. And he wished to say further, that if this Parliament separated without doing very much more than provide for an increase in our armaments, the country would be greatly dissatisfied. The people required large social reforms, and they believed that it was the intention of the Government to effect them. The true way to secure the country was to govern it justly, and to cause the incidence of taxation to be revised, and the taxation itself lightened as much as possible. They wanted measures to make the working men better and happier. Improve the position of the working man as much as possible, and no increase of an outside army would be required to defend the hearths and homes that would be so dear to all.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he rose to express the regret not only of himself, but of a large number of people out-of-doors, that Her Majesty's Government had not seen fit to give a greater prominence to the Licensing question. He had no intention of underrating the importance to a large section of the community of the changes proposed to be effected by the various measures about to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. But the Bill to which he should have wished greater prominence given affected the home of every poor man in the kingdom. The little he had done in that direction had been done with the view of pointing the road for the Government to follow, and from the promises held out last Session, and held out to the country during the last few months, he believed the Government really meant to deal with the question. In the course of the past Session, and during the last few months, promises had been given by the Government that this subject would be dealt with. He regretted to find that the answer the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had given to a Question put to him that evening was very similar to one he had given last Session on the same subject. A Licensing Bill had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech of last year, and hon. Members had been told that such a measure would be brought in as soon as Her Majesty's Government could see their way to its being debated. But the end of the Session arrived without such a Bill being even laid upon the Table, and he was afraid that the matter would be shelved in a similar manner during the present Session. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would give him an assurance that such a measure would be brought in shortly. Although the question did not bear a very attractive title, still it was one that deeply affected a very large section of the community.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he did not rise to censure the past policy of the Government, because he did not regard the present as a very happy or convenient moment for discussing foreign affairs; but to remind the House that the speech of the First Minister of the Crown had raised the suspicion that a new line of policy was about to be adopted, and that they had a right to demand from the right hon. Gentleman a clear, plain, and straightforward declaration as to what shape that policy would take. As far as he could gather from the right hon. Gentleman's observations, he appeared to think it very doubtful whether there were any treaties in existence binding in any way on the honour of England. Certainly, the whole tenour of the right hon. Gentleman's speech had led him to imagine that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to abandon the treaty neutralizing the Black Sea. The question involved was a most important one. It certainly seemed to him that if we abandoned one treaty, a reason would be supplied by that course for declining to maintain any treaty to which we might be a party. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr.

Gilpin) had rather supported the same view by instancing the case of the Napoleonic dynasty. No doubt this country was as much pledged to the prevention of that dynasty from being placed on the throne of France as it was pledged to any other undertaking that we had ever given. At the same time, he perfectly agreed with the statement of a great man, that treaties were not made to last for ever. But then it might fairly be asked what was to be the limit in regard to the binding force of treaties? If England must merely look on, then the smaller the army, the fewer the ships and soldiers, and the less expenditure we had the better; but if it was our duty to maintain the honour of England, in regard to her word and signature attached to treaties with foreign Powers, then it seemed to him that the amount and burden of the guarantee we had given should be determined early in the Session, and before the House proceeded to consider the Army and Navy Estimates. It was, therefore, of the highest importance that the Government should give an answer to the House on this point as early as possible. He concurred in the sentiment uttered by the hon. Member for Northampton, that the great strength of England would consist in social reform; and he likewise supported the hon. Member's opinion that the burdens of the country should be fairly imposed. He hoped that when his hon. Friend and Colleague (Sir Massey Lopes) brought forward the question of local taxation, and of the injustice inflicted upon the landed interest and the tenant-farmers, the House would find the hon. Member for Northampton supporting his hon. Friend not only by the ability of his speech, but by his efficient assistance in Committee.

MR. RATHBONE said, he concurred with the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) in the hope that the Government would bring forward some clear and definite measure respecting the Licensing question. There was no question which so strongly excited the attention of all classes in this country, and particularly of the working classes. Many had pledged themselves to a measure of this nature, and if it were not brought forward he felt they would have broken their pledges.

MR. BRUCE said, he did not know that any stronger pledge upon the subject could be given than that which was given in the announcement in the Speech from the Throne. It was well known that the Licensing Bill was one of the measures which could not be carried in the preceding Session on account of the want of time. The reputation of the Government was dear to them, and the mention of the subject for a second time in the Queen's Speech seemed to him a sufficient guarantee that it was the intention of the Government to deal with the subject. For his own part, he believed that no measure, not even the most important of those passed during the preceding Session, excited deeper interest among the people of this country than any that might be considered for the suppression of drunkenness. The working classes felt that it was a question which affected themselves as a particular portion of the community, on account of the special temptations to which they were, perhaps, more immediately subjected than was any other class. At the same time, the Government must be allowed to choose the period of the Session when, in their judgment, measures should be brought forward. He was not aware of any advantage that could accrue from fixing an early day for the consideration of so important a question; and he thought it was to put a somewhat hard and harsh interpretation upon the declared intention of the Government for hon. Members to demand at so early a period of the Session that a day should at once be named by the Government when they intended to bring forward any particular measure. No hon. Member would question the importance of the Education Bill, yet that measure was not brought forward until a later period of last Session. There were several other important measures to be brought forward, in regard to which a strong feeling prevailed among a large class of the population. One of these was the Regulation of Mines Bill, on which depended the improvement of the present condition of that important industry, the pursuit of which imperilled so many lives. He had received a communication on this question from the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), to whom he now repeated the assurance he had already given to the noble Lord in private, that the Government would exert every effort in order to carry that measure through at the earliest possible period consistent with just claims from other quarters. Having said so much he must now notice a statement made elsewhere by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), who had imputed to him (Mr. Bruce) language he had never used, inasmuch as the hon. Gentleman represented that, while addressing his constituency, he exulted over the misfortunes of France. He (Mr. Bruce) now assured the House that nothing could be further from his mind than the expression of a sentiment of exultation at the misfortunes of any country. In the middle of September last, when heated discussions took place about the necessity of increasing our armaments, the question was raised whether it was not the duty of the Government to call Parliament together to deliberate upon that particular question, and he uttered what appeared to him a very obvious and by no means original observation, that this country was under no pressing danger justifying immediate anxiety or alarm. He said there was but one country which had possessed that rare combination of naval and military power which could excite reasonable fears; that Russia, however powerful by land, was weak at sea; and, unfortunately for France, the fate of war had been so adverse to her that for some time to come no danger could be apprehended from her. In brief, the statement he made was based upon the most evident facts, and in making it, nothing was farther from his intention than to exult over the fate of a country with which he had felt our own ties were so strong and close. With respect to the challenge thrown out by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) that the Government should give an expression of their policy with regard to the discussions likely to arise between France and Germany relating to the question of peace, he believed that the hon. Gentleman would act more judiciously in not pressing his demand until we heard what were to be the terms of peace. It was not for the Government of this country to declare either for France or for Germany what they considered those terms should be. When those terms were declared it would be time enough to express an opinion on the question. He could conceive nothing more injurious to the interests of Great Britain than for its Government to take any step which would have even an appearance of a desire to dictate to either party what terms they should offer or what they should accept.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was quite ready to give the Government credit for their intention to bring forward a Licensing measure; but the House must remember that the question ought properly to have been introduced last Session, and the Government must be judged, not so much by their words as by their deeds. With regard to the feeling throughout the country on this subject, there was an impression, and he thought a growing impression, that the Government had not yet made up their minds as to the principle on which the proposed measure ought to be framed. It was certainly the feeling of various deputations which waited upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the course of the last Session, that the Government had more than once changed their minds in regard to the principle upon which they should frame the Bill, and it would doubtless be a great disappointment to the country at large to hear that the whole of the Recess had practically been wasted, and that the period was still indefinite when the Government would be able to bring the measure before the House, he would venture to suggest that the Government might lay the Bill on the Table of the House, if not in a week or two, at least at a very early period, so that the country might at least know that a principle had at last been agreed upon, and might have an ample opportunity of discussing the principle of the measure, and making up its mind as to whether it was one it might accept.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he must express his regret that a day had not been named for the introduction of the measure; but he was very far from wishing to condemn the Government without seeing the Bill it was intended to bring forward. No time should be lost by the Government in declaring the principle of the Bill, so that they might know what they were to expect. Nobody felt more dissatisfied than he last Session with reference to the conduct of Government with regard to home affairs. He regretted, for instance, that the Licensing Bill was not brought forward, and that the Ballot was shelved. But he felt he would be doing wrong not to approve the foreign policy of the Government; and he only hoped they would strictly adhere to that policy, and continue to resist the clamour of what might, without speaking disrespectfully, be called the war party in that House. It appeared to him there was never a moment in the lifetime of this generation when there was less necessity to strengthen and increase our armaments. We had always heard that our large forces were necessary because of the ambition of France. But the French were now in a position which rendered them unable to strike a blow at us for many years to come. Were we then to be in fear of the Prussians, who conquered the French? Prussia, after the late expenditure of blood and money, was in a less formidable condition than before. And what was the reason of the misery of these two countries? He maintained that it arose entirely from the "bloated armaments" which they had of late years kept on foot, and that it would have been much better for both if all the money which they had for years past expended in preparing for war had been cast into the sea. He could not help thinking that if we in this island of ours could not place ourselves in a fit state of defence on an expenditure of £25,000,000 a year, there must be something radically wrong in the system which we pursued. Formerly it was said the country would be fully protected if the Militia were formed. We got the Militia. Then it was urged that we must have Volunteers. And now that we had the Volunteers they were said to be worth nothing at all. If what Her Majesty's Government proposed to do was to secure increased efficiency with our present expenditure, the Government would have every support from Members on that (the Ministerial) side of the House; but they would find objections equally strong to the expenditure of a single penny in the increase of fresh armaments. Of course our present expenditure would not satisfy many people, any more than had the amount which we had expended upon fortifications. He had been led to make these remarks from his great anxiety to see the Government carry out those measures which they had announced for reform in our home affairs. He trusted they would go on with the measures which they had promised, and carry out the war which they had hitherto waged against pauperism, vice, and immorality, enemies in our very midst; and if they did this and pursued a course of honest and sensible home reform, they would, he believed, while finding the power of the Government consolidated, at the same time earn the gratitude of the country at large.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he was sorry to hear his hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) charge hon. Gentlemen who were sensitive for the honour and zealous for the dignity of the country with being desirous of plunging England into war. He had heard such insinuations out-of-doors, but had always disregarded them as palpably unjust. For himself, and all whose sympathies he shared, he must repudiate and repel them as wholly undeserved. They were not there to incite to war, but to expostulate against exorbitant and oppressive terms of peace—terms which they sincerely believed it was not for the true and lasting good of the people of Germany that their Sovereign should exact. For the many years during which he had had the honour of a seat in that House, he had steadily opposed an excessive expenditure and wanton intermeddling with foreign affairs; but he was, nevertheless, as desirous as any hon. Member could be that the honour and dignity of this country should be maintained. The Queen had reminded the House that but a few days had elapsed since a most destructive and desolating war had ceased to rage, and that only a few days might possibly elapse before its ravages might recommence. These were terrible words from the gracious lips of Royalty; but not more terrible than true. On ordinary occasions the Speech from the Throne, which was but the programme of the Minister for the Session, was met by that House with political politeness. But this was the longest and most pregnant Speech which had for a long time been delivered from the Throne. Her Majesty had in that Speech expressed her desire to take counsel of her Commons and Peers—not for peace alone and not solely for settlement of home questions. Events had occurred during the last six months such as had not happened during the lifetime of the oldest Member of that House; they had witnessed a war which he could compare, as far as his limited reading went, to nothing since the times of Attila and Ghengis Khan. They had seen the fairest portion of Christendom laid waste, villages burnt, open towns bombarded, and city after city laid under ruinous requisition; the youth of the country had been decimated, old age and infancy driven to seek shelter in the open fields, the wounded left uncared for in the open amid frost and snow, and un-offending families, who had not fled in time, destroyed as they lay in their beds. To end such guilt and misery, France had said—"Take all the money we have, and go;" but the victors wanted more than money. They wanted the humiliation, abasement, and utter prostration of France. They would not say definitely what the terms were to be; but he (Mr. Torrens) and those who thought with him, felt that it was the duty of the neutral States, and of England, especially, as the chief of those States, to interplead while there was time in favour of moderate and reasonable terms, and to say aloud that, for the sake of Europe, France ought not to be thus cruelly and utterly undone. Yet the Home Secretary told the House that they had better wait before giving an opinion, and learn what terms the conqueror might think fit to impose. They had better wait till the promised Papers were on the Table in order that they might see what Ministers had done during the Recess, and to understand their reasons for what they had left undone. It was, indeed, quite true that, before making up their minds regarding the conduct of Ministers, the House could afford to wait, but France could not wait—she was in jeopardy every hour. He held in his hand a letter from a French gentleman whom he had never seen. He would not mention the name of the writer, although he had no objection to furnish it privately to any hon. Member who might desire it. The writer was, however, a distinguished man, who had held Office under more than one Administration, and was a member of the new National Assembly. Without uttering a single word or reproach against England, his correspondent, writing on the 31st of January, said—

"If the Neutral Powers intend to show any desire to act it must be in the interval between the Armistice and the meeting of the Assembly.

Mr. W. M. Torrens

If the English people desire an end of the war and a cessation of William's massacres, let them press with their whole weight, that reasonable terms may be made. Prussia asks securities. The neutralization of a strip of frontier territory would meet the case. The peace of Europe would thus be guaranteed, and wars become more difficult."

What did they ask for? Sacrifice from Germany, or favour for France? Nothing of the kind. They asked for no more than moderation, reason, and justice.—

"Justice [said Mr. Burke] is the standing policy of great and free States, and any eminent departure from it lies under the suspicion of being no policy at all."

We should be forsaking and forgetting the highest sanctions and duties of international justice if we did not do all in our power at a crisis like the present to prevent the imposition on disarmed France of extortionate and intolerable terms. The original cause of war—who was right and who was wrong—was not now the question. The question now was as to European peace. He pleaded for France, not for the sake of France herself, but for the sake of England, and for the sake of Western Europe. So far from believing, with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin), that the people of this country were satisfied with the policy of isolation, which was repudiated by the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown last evening, he felt convinced that the country at large was anxiously waiting to learn what the Government intended to do. He would ask his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) what man in his senses, were he Conservative, Radical, or Whig, would do anything to deserve the imputation of wishing to plunge his country into war, and venture to appear before a constituency with any hope of success, seeing how largely the constituencies of hon. Members were dependent for their daily bread upon the prosperity of the trade and industry which war so seriously impaired? It was for the Government to defend their own reputation, and when the time arrived the conduct of the Government would no doubt be discussed; but they had also a duty to discharge, and they should not feel that that duty had been discharged towards either the country or the Crown if they passed a colourless Address, which might be suitable enough for ordinary occasions, and did not tell Her Majesty what was the earnest and heartfelt wish of all classes in this country — that everything should be done in our power to give France a fair chance to live, as we should like ourselves to be let live. He maintained that if we did not do this we should not be doing our duty as a great nation, and we should probably have to pay dearly for it hereafter. He would wish to refer for a moment to the question of indemnity. His hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had said that France had paid very dearly in blood and treasure, but so had Prussia. Yes, but Prussia intended to get back the money. It was not the blood that she intended to get back—that was like water spilt in the sand, and could not be recovered. When the House parted last autumn the war was beginning, and we had then the word of a King, which used to be a solemn thing, that the war was not against France, but against the French Emperor and the army. That war went on for three months, and during all that time he asked any hon. Gentleman to say whether a single voice was raised by any one of weight or influence in this country asking the Government to interpose? Not one. When, at the end of that time, the Emperor, two of his armies, and his greatest fortresses were in the hands of the enemy, then a change came over the spirit of our people. From that day a deeper feeling in favour of France had become perceptible; the people thought that the war ought to be ended, and from that day they were anxious to know what ought to be done. If not after Sedan, at least after Metz it was time for the war to have ended. The doctrine he was prepared to hold was that there and then the war did end, that a new war was begun against France and her people—a war of vengeance, a war of devastation, and a war of conquest. They had heard the First Minister of the Crown last night say in cautious and measured terms that the representations made by this country and other Powers against the threatened bombardment of Paris might at least be looked back upon with peculiar satisfaction by those who had made those representations. That was a diplomatic way of saying a great deal, and he (Mr. W. M. Torrens) was delighted to think that we had the least share whatever in saving for a time that multitudinous and beautiful city from what would be the disgrace of the age. But there was an expression used by the First Minister which he hoped he might say he had misunderstood. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to convey—he fully believed without intending it—that we, by our representations, had obtained from the King of Prussia in the first instance the withdrawal of the candidature of the Prince of Hohenzollern. As a matter of history, he believed nothing was more demonstrable than that the withdrawal of the candidature by the King of Prussia never took place and we had certainly no part in obtaining it. He had been favoured with a perusal of the telegram sent by M. Benedetti to his Government on the 13th of July, giving an account of his final interview with King William—

“I observed to His Majesty that the resignation of the Prince of Hohenzollern, approved by him, was a guarantee for the present, but it appeared necessary to insure for the future, perfect and mutual confidence, and for this purpose I hoped the King would allow me to inform you in his name that if the Prince changed his mind he would interpose to prevent it. The King absolutely refused, saying that he could not and would not make such an engagement, and that he must for this and every other eventuality preserve the liberty of consulting circumstances.”

He (Mr. W. M. Torrens) had gone carefully over all the documents, and he was prepared to assert that not only was the first intimation of the withdrawal made by the French Ambassador to the King of Prussia, but that on the following day, when the King became aware that the information was correct, he sent an aide-de-camp to Count Benedetti with the spontaneous declaration that for the future he reserved his liberty of action in the event of the Prince changing his mind. If that were so, it was obvious that France was not so inexcusable as had been supposed, for it should be remembered that the candidature of the Prince was not spoken of then for the first time. The Journal Officiel of 30th March, 1869, contained a despatch in which the Government of Berlin, when expostulated with, had renounced their designs on the throne of Spain. Well, then, the candidature having been first tried in 1869 and disclaimed, it was revived in 1870. Baron de Thile, when called on for explanations, declared that the Cabinet of Berlin knew nothing of it, and referred the French Chargé d’Affaires to the King as the head of the Royal Family, whom it alone concerned; but, as head of the family, the King, when appealed to, absolutely refused to bid the Prince withdraw, or to repudiate his candidature. His retirement for the time being was compassed wholly by other means, and the Spanish Ambassador at Paris was the first to make known the fact to the Duc de Gramont. What security then had France that a design thus twice furtively planned, would not be attempted a third time? If that were so, then the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers, though sound and good, had been ineffectual. Then he would ask the House to refer to the position in which we stood when we gave that advice on the occasion when Lord Granville wrote to Lord Augustus Loftus, directing him to throw all the weight of this country into the scale to induce Prussia to withdraw. Let the House now endeavour to put itself into that position, and try to apprehend what the Queen in her Speech from the Throne told them She apprehended—namely, that a third war would break out unless wisdom and forethought were exercised betimes on the part of those concerned. What he contended for was that England was deeply concerned; because he did not believe any peace worth talking of if it were an extortionate peace as regarded money, a partitioning peace as regarded territory, or a humiliating peace as regarded honour. He was told that the extravagant sum of 10 milliards stated as an indemnity was but a fable, and that four milliards was nearer the truth. He was speaking in the presence of men capable of judging as to the rate at which even such a sum could be raised either in London, Amsterdam, or Frankfort, and he asked what would be the amount of the interest on that sum which would assuredly be for many years an impayable debt? And what was an impayable debt when due to a foreign conqueror but a tribute imposed by one nation on another? The power to impose such a tribute was the very definition of conquest. We could not tell what the conqueror might ask; but he hoped that the House would press upon the Government its earnest desire that on behalf of the peace of Europe and the weal of England they should make such representations as would show in a legitimate way that they were opposed to extortion. Mr. Grattan, speaking of another conqueror, said—

France had been made desolate, and Germany had been made an empire. The past was irrevocable; but the present and the future were still in our hands. The spectacle now exhibited in France was an ominous lesson to Europe and to the rest of the world; and if we in our power, who were said to be the freest, richest, and greatest country on earth, showed any hesitation in taking a bold and manly course, the nations of Western Europe would view their position with despair—they would feel that they might be dealt with in our time as Macedon dealt with the smaller states of Greece, as Poland in the last century, as Denmark in our own day had been dealt with, because we had not the wit, the wisdom, and the worth to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the appeal of the hon. Member who had just spoken to hon. Gentlemen opposite meant, if it meant anything, that the Government should intervene in such a way as to make our power and influence felt in the determination of the terms of peace. The hon. Gentleman had said that England's power ought to be brought to bear. ["Hear, hear!"] What did that mean, and what did hon. Gentlemen opposite mean by those cheers? Were they prepared to say to Prussia—"If you do not come to such and such terms with France we will declare war against you?" The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had a sort of hazy idea that we might go to a certain extent and bring a sort of unknown power to bear upon Prussia and France, and that without exerting any physical strength, but merely by the shadow of something behind, we might induce Prussia, conquering and victorious, to submit her judgment to ours. He did not for one moment suppose that she would do so, or that any hon. Member would propose to back up the view of Her Majesty's Government as to the proper terms of peace by an appeal to physical force. The view put forward by the hon. Gentleman, that we ought to constitute ourselves the arbiters of Europe and the protectors of all the other Western Powers, could only be enforced

if we had a Government possessing the quality of omniscience, backed up by omnipotence. Now, the fact was that upon the part of our own Government there was no omniscience. He had a very high opinion of the ability and knowledge of the Members of Her Majesty's Government; but he did not attribute either to them, or to any Government which might be formed by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) the possession of omniscience. The history of this country showed that, with the best intentions, gross mistakes had been made by the Government of England in dealing with foreign countries, and that they had calculated upon eventualities which never happened. A system, no doubt, was kept up which was supposed to give us some means of anticipating future events, but experience proved that in this we were continually disappointed. Why, last autumn something like a panic showed itself in the House, and every hon. Member was considering what would follow when the Emperor Napoleon had crushed Prussia and got to Berlin, as it was then believed he might easily do. The Government, even, fell in with that view to some extent, and, yielding to pressure, adopted measures in preparation for an emergency that had never arisen. Something had been said about our military power, and it was implied that if we could once raise a sufficient force there might be some chance of our carrying out a dignified and spirited policy. But was it imagined, after the experience of this war, that we could hope to compete with the great military monarchies of the Continent? Why, the thing was perfectly preposterous. At one time there was a talk of our sending 20,000 men to Antwerp, and £2,000,000 of money were voted in anticipation. But what could 20,000 men have done? Why, in the great battles which had been fought, the belligerents were able to bring something like 1,000,000 men into the field. The true dignity and honour of the country were in no degree affected by our not having interfered in this unfortunate quarrel. They were far better supported by the sympathy and liberality shown towards the suffering people of Paris. He had no wish to isolate this country from considerations affecting the welfare of others, but he certainly wished to withdraw her from interference which proved in no degree advantageous to national interests. After all the blood and treasure which had been spent, could we point to a single treaty or engagement of the slightest value to the people of this country? A vast debt had been contracted in carrying out a spirited policy, and no benefit whatever had been obtained. This ought to be a great warning to Gentlemen upon both sides of this House. For his own part, he should support the course which had been taken by Her Majesty's Government, and he had no doubt their influence would be exerted at the proper time in favour of moderate terms of peace, which in the end would prove most lasting.

Address agreed to:—To be presented by Privy Councillors.

PRINCESS LOUISE.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

Message from Her Majesty brought up, and read by Mr. Speaker (all the Members being uncovered), as follows:—

VICTORIA R.

Her Majesty relies upon the cordial interest which Her faithful Commons have expressed in the approaching marriage between the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne.

The numerous proofs which the Queen has received of their loyalty to Her Throne, and of their attachment to Her person and Family, lead Her to hope that they will make such a provision for the Princess Louise, with a view to the proposed marriage, as may be suitable to the dignity of the Crown.

Committee thereupon upon Monday next.

RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to alter the Law respecting Religious Tests in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, and in the Halls and Colleges of those Universities, said: Sir, the Motion which I have to make will entail the necessity of only a very short explanation, as the House, I think, will feel that the question to which my Motion refers has now reached a stage at which it is not necessary upon the introduction of the Bill that there should be any prolonged debate upon the merits of the question. Had it been necessary, in the judgment of the Government, that arguments should be advanced at this stage in favour of the proposals I am about to make, those arguments would have been used by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. I should not have thought fit to attempt to displace one who with so much prudence and so much knowledge has, during successive years, recommended this subject to the attention of the House. It has fallen into my hands on account of the maturity at which the subject has arrived, and the position it has assumed as a question between the two Houses of Parliament, to propose the introduction of this Bill, and the few words I am about to state will have reference to that peculiar position of the question, and not the merits of the original proposition. Last night my hon. Friend who seconded the Address (Mr. Morley) made an appeal to Gentlemen opposite, urging them to combine with us in the settlement of this controversy. I felt the weight of that appeal, and I would wish to be understood as adopting and echoing his words, and, moreover, I feel within myself a strong conviction that the force of such an appeal will be felt by many who sit on the other side of the House who have hitherto taken a prominent part in opposing this Bill. And here I found myself upon a recollection of the manner in which the Bill was treated during the discussion last year. I am not seeking to take any unfair advantage; I am as far as possible from endeavouring to convey any imputation; but I think that many hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite, and several of those connected with the representation of the Universities, who have hitherto taken a prominent duty and responsibility in opposition to this measure, will not conceive that I misunderstand or misrepresent either their conduct or their language if I say that the general tone and effect of their speeches was to convey on their part the impression that although they did not compromise their opinions nor surrender in any point of right the ground that they had occupied, they did feel that the controversy had reached a point at which it would be for the interest of all parties that it should be brought to a settlement. The Bill that I propose to introduce after the preface that I have made, the House will readily perceive is the exact and identical Bill of last year. I believe it will have undergone no change whatever, and had it been the view of the Government that they were in a condition to introduce important changes, or to be responsible for important changes if they were introduced, I should not have been justified in using the language I have employed. I have treated the controversy as one the discussion of which has been entirely exhausted, and into which I defy any ingenuity to import novelty of any kind. The controversy is a controversy upon which the judgment of this House and the country has been so often and so decisively pronounced that all that remains is its settlement. In the course of the Recess a desire, and I do not say an unnatural desire, has been made known to the Government from several quarters that the provisions of the Bill should be altered—[Cheers—]in consequence of the rejection of the Bill of last year by the House of Lords. Well, I wish to call the attention of my hon. Friends who cheer me, for a few moments, to that subject, and to state the ground taken by the Government, and the position in which they find themselves now in the face of the House of Lords. The desire entertained by many persons out-of-doors is that into this Bill should be introduced an absolute repeal of all restrictions contained in College statutes which make the acquisition of Holy Orders a condition under any circumstances of holding a Headship or Fellowship. Well, no man, I think, can hear those words without at once admitting, whether he approves or disapproves such a proposal—and that is not the question now—that the introduction of such a proposal into the present Bill would be a great extension and a great alteration of the provisions of the Bill. The effect of that would be that we should not be winding up an old controversy, but we should be beginning a new one. So far as I am able to anticipate what would probably happen, I apprehend that it would be necessary for us to listen to appeals from hon. Gentlemen who represent the Universities, and many others in this House pointing out the novelty and broad sweep of the proposition—that it was now for the first time under the consideration of the House, and demanding that days should be appointed for the discussion of various and complicated matters involved in the measure, and giving a totally distinct character to the discussion to that which I anticipate respecting this Bill. I do not enter into the merits of the case, for that is quite unnecessary. I will not enter into the consideration how the Government is to find time amidst the pressure of the multitude of important subjects which are pressed upon us from every quarter of the House. The point which has been conclusive with the Government, and which binds them, is that which arises in connection with the position of this question as between ourselves and the House of Lords, and it is that point on which alone I shall dwell. Now, had this Bill been in the hands of what are called independent Members of Parliament, it would have been perfectly free to them to take any course they pleased in altering it from year to year. They might have said—"The House of Lords having rejected the Bill, we shall propose another measure of a much more drastic character." That course would be quite within the discretion and competency of a private Member of this House, but it is not within the discretion, rightly understood, of the Executive Government. When the Executive Government makes itself responsible for a measure, and has attached to it its credit and influence, when they have obtained the assent of this House to it, one thing follows as an immediate and obvious consequence—namely, that they are bound to give the House of Lords a fair, full, and free opportunity for discussion and deliberate judgment before assuming that the House of Lords is decisively opposed to that measure, and before reconsidering their course in consequence. Now, the question that we ask ourselves is this—whether it would be fair on our part as the Government of the Queen, whether it would be consistent with that respect which we owe to the other branch of the Legislature, that we should treat the vote of the House of Lords in the month of July last as being a decisive vote upon the merits of the question? We do not think that we can so treat it. We think it right and just to the House of Lords, we think it right according to the rules which regulate the well-working of our legislative system, that we should again at the earliest period in the present Session present to the House of Lords this measure for consideration. We entertain the sanguine hope that hon. Gentlemen opposite will favour the passing of the Bill through this House. But whether that be so or not, whether we are right or not in anticipating the early settlement of the controversy, we feel it to be our duty to that branch of the Legislature to give it the opportunity of a full, careful, and deliberate discussion of the merits of the Bill. I do not think it would be fair in us to treat the vote of last year, much as we objected to it, and much as we resented it, as a decisive vote. In the first place, it was the first time that the Bill had been before the House of Lords in the shape that it then bore. The Bill was sent to that House in the month of July, and it was on the 14th of July that the second reading was held. Upon the House of Lords, in the course of last Session, we made great demands, and from the House of Lords, I do not hesitate to say, we obtained last year large and liberal concessions. When these liberal concessions have been obtained by a Government backed by the authority of the House of Commons, that Government ought to show some sense of that conduct and some reciprocation of that temper. We should, therefore, be unwilling to proceed in a harsh or ungenerous manner in regard to the controversy of this Bill, and we think we shall not be discharging our duty with respect to the House of Lords, as well with respect to the general interests of the question, unless we can send this Bill to the House of Lords at a time when they can receive it, before it comes to them in a crowd with greater measures of such vital importance as the Education and the Irish Land Bills of last year. I have not said a word upon the merits of the case, but I have endeavoured to put prominently in the view of the House that consideration which I think is quite decisive in regard to the conduct of the Government. We have found it to be our duty to make one more appeal to the House of Lords upon this subject under the favourable circumstances that are now before us. We also feel justified in making an appeal to those who have hitherto opposed this measure on the opposite side of the House, and in asking them to assist us to pass it forward without entailing upon it those difficulties which attend the discussion of great questions. It is right, Sir, that I should state I have had communication with many leading, influential persons among those who are desirous that this measure should be further extended, so as to dispense with Holy Orders in the case of all holders of Fellowships and Headships, and that they should be free of all restriction whatever. I have frankly stated to them the position of the Government and the obligation they feel themselves under with reference to the House of Lords, and I have intimated to them that in the view they take of their duty it will not be possible to accede to their wish. I have also learnt from them, so far as the feeling could be collected, after that declaration made frankly on the part of the Government, that they were still anxiously desirous we should prosecute this Bill in its present shape, with the explanation I have now made. I am, therefore, acting in fulfilment of the willingness I expressed to them; and I hope Gentlemen opposite will not think me too obtrusive if I state that it is our intention to go forward with this Bill with all despatch in the prosecution of all its stages, because we think it fair to those who desire the extension of the measure that it should be presented to the House of Lords at so early a period of the Session that, in the event of its failing to become law, they may not be prejudiced in their views, but have ample opportunity during the Session of raising the question after the feeling of the House of Lords shall have been expressed on this Bill; and I do hope that some influence even from the other side of the House may favour the passing of the Bill. With these explanations, I beg to move that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair, in order that the Motion may be made for the introduction of the Bill.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I shall certainly follow the example which has been set by the right hon. Gentleman, and entirely abstain from making any comment on the question itself or the principles involved in it. I cannot but say that I think the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman in bringing forward this Bill at an early period is not at all in discord with the view taken by the House of Lords last year. I agree that the House of Lords expressed no objection to the reception of the Bill, but, on the contrary, showed rather a disposition to give it that full consideration which it had never, on any previous occasion, received. Indeed, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, it had never before reached the House of Lords in the shape it did last year, and the desire was that the Committee should take such steps, by receiving evidence and information on the subject, as should tend to preserve religious instruction in the University; and that, I presume, would still be the object of the Committee if re-appointed. With respect to the course we should take on the subject, I quite agree that so far as this House is concerned the majority against us is overwhelming, and, therefore, though it will be my duty to protest against the measure, I should only wish that time may be given us for consultation as to what steps should be taken at some particular stage; but no opposition will be offered to proceeding with the Bill with such speed as may be considered becoming, with a view to the objects and intentions of the Government as explained by the right hon. Gentleman. I have been opposed to the measure in principle, I remain of the same opinion still, and I may consider it necessary to divide on the question again on the second reading; but I will offer no opposition to the measure by interposing delay. I hope it will receive due consideration from the House of Lords and from the Committee, to which I have no doubt it will be referred.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Benefices Resignation * (7).

QUEEN'S SPEECH.—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD (the Earl of BESSBOROUGH) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

MY LORDS,

I THANK you for your loyal Address, and for the expression of your good wishes upon the approaching marriage of My daughter.

I do not doubt that the measures which will be submitted to you will receive your attentive consideration, and you may rely with confidence on My cordial co-operation in every effort to promote the welfare and the security of My people.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, That the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table: The same was ordered to be printed. (No. 6.)

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS LOUISE.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

Her Majesty's most gracious Message of Friday last considered (according to order).

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords—In pursuance of the Notice which I gave at the last sitting of the House, I beg to move that a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for her most gracious Message with regard to making provision for Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, with a view to her intended marriage with the Marquess of Lorne; and assuring Her Majesty that this House will cheerfully concur in such measures as shall be necessary to give effect to the object of Her Majesty's most gracious Message in such a manner as shall demonstrate their affection and attachment to Her Majesty, their just sense of the virtues of Her Royal Highness, and a due regard to the dignity of the Royal Family. It happens, my Lords, that I have had the honour, on three previous occasions, of moving a similar Address with regard to the marriage of daughters of our most gracious Sovereign, and of receiving the unanimous approbation of the House in so doing. Upon the occasions of those Motions expressions were used on both sides of the House which showed a sense of the dignity of the Royal Family, and a warm interest in anything calculated to increase their domestic happiness. My Lords—The anticipations which were indulged in on those occasions have been abundantly fulfilled; and this, I cannot help thinking, has been very much owing to the wise rule laid down by the Queen and the late Prince Consort with regard to the marriage of their children. They would give no sanction to the marriage of their children without direct consultation of their personal feelings and affection. I am sure that your Lordships, in agreeing, as I am confident you will, to this Motion, will feel the same confidence which you expressed on former occasions, that the approaching marriage will increase the domestic felicity of the Royal Family.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords—I am glad that it will not be necessary for me, on the present occasion, to occupy as much of your Lordships' time as on a former evening, for with regard to the Motion now before the House the noble Earl opposite and myself are perfectly agreed. I feel sure that your Lordships will cordially agree to the Motion made by my noble Friend, and will cheerfully concur in making such a provision for the Princess Louise as the House of Commons may think fit and suitable to the dignity of the Crown. We have taken that course, as my noble Friend rightly says, on three former occasions, and I see nothing that should lead us on this occasion to depart from it. It is almost superfluous to say that everything connected with the happiness of the Royal Family must find a hearty response in the breasts of the whole people. I feel sure that your Lordships rejoice at having again an opportunity of re-asserting the loyalty and affection which you feel with me for Her Majesty and her family.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE thought that all their Lordships would feel that in considering a Royal Message of this nature their reply should not be merely formal, but should evidence the devotion they felt for all that touched their Sovereign—their attachment to her person, and their loyalty to her Crown. Their Lordships would say this had been ably, fully, and eloquently expressed by the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, and by the noble Duke the Leader of the other side. There could be no doubt that he himself (Lord Oranmore and Browne) did not possess the capability of expressing the feeling with half the force which those noble Lords possessed, and, of course, little weight could be attached to what might fall from so humble a Member of their Lordships' House. It should, however, be considered that those noble Lords, who had doubtless expressed what they felt, and what the House all felt, for Her gracious Majesty, even had they thought or felt otherwise, would have said the same; while their position prevented them from giving Her Majesty the benefit of hearing a plain truth, which he believed it was the duty of Parliament to convey to her—for majesty was so hedged round with ceremony that perchance truths patent to all never reached the Royal ears. He thought, therefore, that on an occasion of this kind leave and licence might be given to independent Members like himself to express their opinions; and in doing so he thought he should couple his remarks with certain statements which he trusted would be acceptable, and which his noble Friends, from their position, could not well make. Her most gracious Majesty had now reigned over a happy and contented people above 32 years, and it was but a truism to say the wisdom she had shown as a Queen had only been excelled by the admirable example which, as a mother and woman, she had shown to every woman in her broad dominions. It was appreciation of so much excellence which called forth such a heartfelt outburst of sympathy from all her subjects at the time of her great bereavement. Her subjects felt the loss was their own, from a conviction of how wise a counsellor the lamented Prince Consort had been to Her Majesty. For a considerable time afterwards the people of this country sympathized with the retirement of Her Majesty from public life: the greater, however, our veneration and affection for anyone, the more did we feel a separation from them. It seemed as if a rumour of this had reached the ears of Her most gracious Majesty, and that she then published that delightful "Journal" of her life. Many thought that even the evidence of a life so pure, and kind, and good, should not be exposed to public view, and that it was making so high a position too common; but experience had shown that the Queen was wiser than those who thus thought. She trusted her subjects, and she virtually said to them—"This is the life I have lost; would not your life be blank and cold after such a loss? This is why I have not been among you as usual." The people appreciated the confidence which Her Majesty had placed in them. They felt with her and for her, and longed only the more eagerly again to enjoy the privilege and pleasure of seeing her among them. It was wrong to conceal from Her Majesty that the feeling of disappointment was great that she had not condescended to be seen more by her loyal and loving subjects. It was vain to conceal from ourselves that these were no ordinary times. Many things were now called in question which had long been suffered to remain at rest. There was nothing sacred or human that was not weighed in the balance: men's minds were distorted on religious, social, and political subjects: everything was called into question. The existence of a God, the belief in Christianity, the duties of subjects to their Sovereign, the duties of children to their parents, of husbands to their wives, the relative position of women to men,—nothing was now accepted as an axiom. To preserve, therefore, what was most worth preserving in this country—to preserve those institutions under which we lived, the foundation of which was the devotion and loyalty which all classes in this country felt towards Her Majesty, it was necessary that she should be seen more by her loving people, and many would say that it was audacious of so humble a Member of their Lordships' House to venture to tender advice to the Throne; but he thought he was but performing his duty when he said that it would give great delight to her subjects, and would greatly add to their personal attachment to her, if she would come out more among her subjects. He said so with the most sincere respect and devotion, because he felt that duty obliged him, and Her Majesty had always shown so much wisdom, and such a determination to fulfil every duty of her exalted station, that she would not despise the counsel because it came from a humble source, nor regard the performance of a public duty, by a faithful subject, as an intrusion on her high position. If, moreover, he did not truthfully convey public opinion, he was in the presence of the ablest statesmen, as well as the most polished courtiers, in the realm, who would be able to refute what he had felt it his duty to utter.

Then an humble Address of thanks and concurrence ordered nemine dissente to be presented to Her Majesty thereupon: The said Address to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD, CAMBRIDGE, AND DURHAM.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, in accordance with the Notice he had given, he rose to move the re-appointment of the Select Committee, which had sat last Session, on the subject of University Tests. The taking of the evidence did not proceed so rapidly towards the end of last Session as he had hoped it would have done; but from the number of witnesses who remained to be examined, he had very little doubt that the Committee would be able to close the evidence before Easter. If this were so, there was no reason why the deliberations of the Committee might not be embodied in a Report in time to assist their Lordships in considering the details of the University Tests Bill—a measure which, he believed, had already been introduced into the other House of Parliament. He had received no notice of any intention to oppose the adoption of this Motion; and if he were right in supposing that there would be no opposition, he thought it unnecessary now to make any further observations. He would therefore at once move for the appointment of the Committee.

Moved, “That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the best mode of providing proper safeguards for the maintenance of religious instruction and worship and for the religious character of the education given in the said Universities and the Colleges and Halls thereof in any measure for enabling persons not now eligible to hold offices therein.”—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

EARL GRANVILLE said, that while guarding himself against the supposition that he had at all changed his opinion as to the advantage of the appointment of the Committee, or as to its practical results, he did not think it would be respectful to the House, after its decided manifestation of opinion last Session, to oppose the Motion. He was bound also to add that the early day chosen by the noble Marquess for moving the appointment of the Committee and his assurance that its deliberations would be brought to an end in ample time to enable the House to consider the Bill introduced in “another place” were satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER presented a Bill to enable clergymen disabled by illness to resign their benefices with provisions of pensions. He proposed to fix the second reading of the Bill for Thursday next.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that as objections had been entertained to the measure last Session by many Peers, he thought a longer time should be allowed before the next stage.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER observed that the Bill was passed by a large majority last Session, and the clauses to which the main objections were taken—those which did not limit resignation to cases of age and infirmity—had been omitted. Many of the right rev. Prelates and himself were about to start on confirmation tours, so that delay really meant postponing the Bill until after Easter.

LORD CAIRNS said, that this measure related to matters far more important than the personal convenience of any of their Lordships. It was quite true that the Bill passed that House last Session; but it passed at a very late period, when the attendance of Peers was rather small; and it was by no means certain that the same result would have been arrived at if the Bill had been brought forward at an earlier period. The Bill would, probably, not be in the hands of their Lordships until Thursday morning, and if it were to be read a second time on that evening, their Lordships would have had a very slight opportunity of considering it, and the country no opportunity at all. He did not recollect the objections to which the right rev. Prelate referred; but he did recollect that he himself entertained objections which went to the very root of the matter.

LORD ROMILLY hoped the second reading of the Bill would not be pressed. There was a clear advantage in not hurrying on a measure of this nature where there was no especial reason for so doing. He thought their Lordships should have a week for consideration after the Bill had been placed in their hands.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER then consented to fix the second reading for Monday next.

Bill read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Monday next. (No. 7.)

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Order of Friday last, read: Then it was ordered that the Viscount Eversley do also take the chair in all Committees upon Private Bills and other matters in the absence of the Lord Redesdale from illness, unless where it shall have been otherwise directed by this House.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

COMPENSATION FOR RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. HEADLAM asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill during this Session to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session on the subject of Compensation for Railway Accidents?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he was not prepared to introduce any measure such as that indicated; but he was considering the subject of inquiries into railway accidents, both official and judicial. He, however, should wish to see the Bill of which the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had given Notice before he came to a final conclusion what course he should pursue in respect to the subject.

SANITARY COMMISSION—LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to introduce this Session a Bill for consolidating in one all the Sanitary Acts, and giving better means of Local Government to every place in England and Wales outside the Metropolis, under a Central Department, as recommended, and to a great extent prepared, in the Report of the Royal Sanitary Commission?

MR. BRUCE, before answering the Question, said, he was anxious, on the part of the Government, to thank the right hon. Baronet and the other Royal Commissioners, for the great care and labour they had bestowed on this important inquiry, and the special pains they had taken to facilitate legislation in respect to it by the careful analysis they had made of the complicated laws on the subject. Through the right hon. Baronet's courtesy he received a draft of the Report before it was presented to Parliament; but at a late period of the Recess, when every Department was busily occupied in making arrangements for the approaching Session. The several Departments, however, connected with the administration of the sanitary laws were giving their close attention to the subject, and if the right hon. Gentleman would wait for about three weeks he would find that the labours of the Royal Commission had not been in vain.

THE ADMIRALTY—SIR SPENCER ROBINSON.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any reply has been made by Sir Spencer Robinson to the Minute by the First Lord of the Admiralty, published by order of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and whether there will be any objection to lay the reply upon the Table of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: A Minute or Paper has been drawn up by Sir Spencer Robinson in reply to a Minute of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, and if on Friday next my hon. Friend behind me would like to move for the Paper it will be granted, as far as the Government is concerned, as an unopposed Return. But in acceding to that Motion, I do not wish to be committed with regard to the course which it might be right to take in a case which externally resembles this, but which is substantially very different from it—I mean where a member of the Board might differ in opinion, and might draw up a paper expressing that difference of opinion, from the Chief of the Board. Sir Spencer Robinson having ceased to be a member of the Board of Admiralty, that difficulty does not really arise; and, although that Paper was written while he was a member of the Board, still, he being no longer a member, it is quite right to produce it.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked what was the date of the Paper.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not remember the exact date; but it is a recent Paper.

LORD HENRY LENNOX, who had given Notice of his intention to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Vice-Admiral Sir Spencer Robinson has resigned the appointments of Third Lord of the Admiralty and Controller of the Navy; and, if so, what circumstances led to his resignation? said, that the appearance of the new patent of the Board of Admiralty on Friday night required him to alter the form of his Notice. He, therefore, asked what were the reasons which led to the withdrawal of Sir Spencer Robinson from the offices of Third Lord of the Admiralty and the Controller of the Navy, when his withdrawal was so prejudicial to the service of the country?

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to answer the noble Lord's Question, and in doing so I shall carefully avoid giving an opinion on a point in respect to which it appears to me that he was not quite so cautious as is desirable. The fact is that Sir Spencer Robinson has not resigned the offices of Third Lord of the Admiralty and Controller of the Navy. The term of his appointment to the office of Controller of the Navy has expired, and in the office of Third Lord of the Admiralty he is superseded. It would be entirely superfluous to enter at the present time into the matter further than to say that the Government has not come to the conclusion that such a change was necessary without much reflection and consideration. I do not know whether the noble Lord puts the latter part of the Question of which he gave Notice as to the production of letters that have passed between Sir Spencer Robinson and myself; but, if so, I could not agree to produce them, as the proceeding would be unprecedented.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he had omitted the latter part of his Notice because he had been informed that the letters referred to were of a private and confidential character.

DOMINION OF CANADA—BRITISH COLUMBIA.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the arrangements are completed for the union of the Colony of British Columbia with the Dominion of Canada; whether any negotiations have taken place respecting the Railway for connecting that Colony with Canada; and, how soon he will be able to lay upon the Table of the House Papers upon this subject?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, these negotiations were carried on between the Dominion of Canada and the Colony of British Columbia, and the only manner in which the Home Government had interfered in the matter was by expressing its cordial approval of the proposed Federation. No doubt the construction of a railway between this Colony and Canada formed an integral part of the arrangements contemplated, and according to present information, the wise, liberal and patriotic spirit evinced in both the Dominion and the Colony, gave every hope of a satisfactory result. But the proposition had not yet been laid before the Canadian Parliament, which would meet very shortly, and therefore it would not be courteous to that Parliament, and it would be premature, to enter into a discussion on the subject at present. The Papers, however, would be laid on the Table of the House at the earliest opportunity, after the negotiations had reached a stage at which this would be possible.

RELEASED FENIAN PRISONERS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Fenians lately confined in Portland Prison were treated in a different and more indulgent manner than the other prisoners; and, if so, whether the relaxation of the prison regulations in their favour was in consequence of orders to that effect; and, if so, by whom were such orders given; and, whether upon the departure from Cork of the released Fenian prisoners for America any, and what sum of money was given to any of them; and, if so, by whom, and to how many, and for what reason, was such money given?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, the Fenian prisoners lately confined at Portland were, as a measure of security, kept separate from the other prisoners by an order of the Directors given in May, 1866. The Governor was directed by that order to employ these prisoners as a separate party on a description of labour equal to their ability in point both of strength and of knowledge. As a matter of fact, he believed the labour to which they were put was of the lightest kind assigned to prisoners; but their frequent insubordination and consequent punishment made it very difficult for the Governor to obtain any work from them. The only other relaxation of the rules made in their favour of which he was aware was that, in consequence of their friends being rarely able to visit them, owing to the distance from them at which they lived, these prisoners were allowed to receive more letters than the other prisoners by way of compensation. With regard to the money given to them, the course pursued was—mutatis mutandis—the same as in the case of any other prisoners. The practice was, when prisoners were released, to pay the expense of their journey to their place of destination, and to forward a sum varying from £3 to £6, by instalments, to some trustworthy persons, or to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, in case the prisoners were wise enough to consent to that application of the money, in order to provide them with the means of living until they could obtain work. In this instance the passage money of the prisoners was paid for them successively not as first-class passengers, as had been stated, but as second-class passengers, in the first ships that went out from this country; and they were also supplied with £5 for the same purpose as the money given to other released prisoners. Twenty of them received that sum, and of the four others who were released, three of them were discharged in consequence of their term of imprisonment being about to expire, and the fourth was released on a licence in consequence of his extreme state of ill-health. The money given to them was provided out of the Supplies granted by Parliament.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—

THE SIEGE OF PARIS—ABSENCE OF THE ENGLISH CONSUL.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Consul at Paris was absent from his post during the siege with the knowledge and by the permission of the Government; and, if yea, on what ground such permission was given?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, Lord Lyons being intrusted with discretionary powers on the subject by Her Majesty's Government, and acting in concert with his official colleagues in Paris, under the advice of M. Jules Favre, left that city on the 17th of September last. Some days previously he thought it advisable only to retain so many members of the Embassy as were absolutely necessary to carry on the current work. Mr. Lascelles and Mr. Atlee, who is attaché as well as Consul, were selected to leave; they were not, however, to quit France, and were to remain within reach. Previous to Lord Lyons leaving Paris, he did all he could to persuade the British residents to leave; and he urged on them the great risk and danger to which they would be subjected if they resided longer in that city whilst under a state of siege. Similar representations were afterwards made by Mr. Wodehouse, who remained for some time in charge of the Embassy. When at the commencement of the bombardment it was ascertained that many British residents were still in Paris, and difficulties arose as to any diplomatic or consular officer entering the city, the rank of Consul was conferred upon a gentleman well known in Paris, and who had used the most praiseworthy and generous exertions to succour and support the distressed British—by name Mr. Blount, and he has since been acting in that capacity. Mr. Wodehouse has, within the last few days, returned to Paris, and Mr. West is on his way there at the present moment.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce again the Bill for continuing Turnpike Trusts, of which the original Acts have expired; or to introduce any Bill having for its object the abolition of Turnpike Tolls?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, the usual Continuance Bill would be introduced this Session. The Act passed last year would secure the extinction of a good many more turnpike trusts than usual; and, in order to facilitate the ultimate abolition of all turnpike tolls, it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill making the adoption of the Highway Act compulsory.

FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, &c.

QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in conformity with his statement to the House last year, he is prepared to bring in a measure this Session to remedy the state of the law as to the use of false weights and measures, and the adulteration of food, drink, and drugs; or failing that, whether he will introduce such clauses into his proposed Licensing Bill as will effectually meet the evil?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, with reference to the use of false weights and measures a Bill was now in preparation by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. C. Fortescue), who authorized him to say that he hoped in the course of the present Session to be able to introduce it. As to the adulteration of food, drink, and drugs, he apprehended that the Licensing Bill which he himself would bring in would deal very stringently, and he hoped, also, effectually, with the adulteration of drinks. But it was not his intention, in the present Session, to legislate with reference to food or drugs.

NAVY—COMMITTEE ON DESIGNS OF SHIPS OF WAR—THE "CAPTAIN."

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of the Instructions given by the Admiralty to the Committee on Designs of Ships of War, and the Report of the Board of Construction of the Navy to that Committee on the cause of the loss of Her Majesty's ship "Captain?"

MR. BAXTER: If the hon. and gallant Baronet will move for the first Paper referred to in his Question — namely, the instructions given by the Admiralty to the Committee on Designs of Ships of War, there will be no objection to its production. But it would be unusual and inconvenient to lay on the Table of this House Papers in the nature of evidence furnished to such Committee before it has reported, and therefore I hope that the second Paper referred to will not be asked for in the meantime.

PATENT MUSEUM.—QUESTION.

MR. HINDE PALMER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any steps have been, or are intended to be taken, for providing a Patent Museum and offices adequate to the requirements of the nation, in pursuance of the Report for 1869 of the Patent Law Commissioners, and the several previous Reports therein referred to?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, stated that he held in his hand the Report to which the hon. and learned Gentleman's Question referred; but he was unable to find a recommendation in favour of any particular plan. In one part of that Report it was stated that it would be desirable that a Patent Museum should be built at Kensington; in another part reference was made to a suggestion that the proposed building should be erected on the Thames Embankment; while in another part it was stated that for the last 18 years a great many parties had been anxious that it should be built on the site of the present office in Southampton Buildings. He believed that for the last 18 years it had been a moot point where it would be convenient for the new Patent Office to be erected, and what should be put in it when it was built. It was doubtful whether any such building could be erected until an Act of Parliament was passed to regulate the management of the museum, having regard to the interests of manufacturers and traders. He might further observe that during the last few years the whole of the Patent Laws had been called in question, and Notice had been given by one hon. Member of his intention to introduce a measure dealing with those laws, and by two other hon. Members of their intention to move for a Select Committee in order to effect their total abolition. In the view of the possibility of the Patent Laws being entirely swept away, it would scarcely be desirable that steps should be taken to build a new Patent Museum.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—RE-VICTUAL- LING OF PARIS.—QUESTION.

MR. BECKETT DENISON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any ground whatsoever for the published statement that the German military authorities are placing impediments in the way of importing provisions into Paris?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is not in my power to give more than an imperfect answer to the Question of the hon. Member. Undoubtedly, to my great regret, the Government have heard that there have been very considerable impediments placed in the way of transporting provisions to Paris; but we have received no information to justify us in placing the responsibility for those impediments upon the Prussian military authorities. The latest information, in fact, that we have received is from Captain Cowen, who was at Havre yesterday, and who stated that provisions could not pass by rail either to Paris or to Rouen, but that they were being sent by river; that every effort would be made by him, and that he was going to Rouen to see the Prussian commandant there upon the subject. In the meantime a telegram was sent by the Foreign Office to Versailles to lay the difficulties in the way of the transit of provisions to Paris before the Prussian military authorities, and to beg that they might be removed as far as lay in their power. I may, however, say that in a country devastated by war the state of the railways and of the rolling stock may account for the circumstances which we all so deeply regret.

THE JURY ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. LOPES asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been drawn to the difficulties which will arise at the approaching Assizes in respect of the payment of Jurors under the provisions of the Jury Act passed last Session, and the insufficiency of the funds available for such payments; and whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt any means to obviate such difficulties; and, whether the Government propose to introduce a measure for the amendment of the Jury system?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that the measure to which the Question of the hon. and learned Member referred had been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and, although he believed the measure, on the whole, to be a good one, great objection had undoubtedly been raised to one of its clauses which related to the payment of jurors. It was questionable, indeed, whether that particular clause was sound in principle, and he had himself some doubt whether parties ought to be taxed for the payment of jurors, because it was a question whether if jurors were to be paid they ought not to be paid by the State. The clause in question had given rise to considerable difficulty in Westminster Hall, and would in all probability occasion still greater inconvenience on the circuit. Under these circumstances, he proposed to introduce a short Bill to repeal this particular clause in the Act, and it would be a question whether some better machinery could not be devised in its place.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES— ARMY ORGANIZATION.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will consent to postpone taking any Vote in the Army Estimates till the House has had time to consider the changes in Army Organization to be proposed in the Bill which he intends to introduce on Thursday next?

MR. CARDWELL: I think the proposal is a perfectly reasonable one. I shall not ask for any Vote in the Army Estimates until the plan for the reorganization of the Army has been laid upon the Table of the House. I had, perhaps, better state that the course I think it will be most convenient to take is that I should make my statement on Thursday next in Committee of Supply, and that Progress should then be reported, in order that the House may have time to consider the plan for the reorganization of the Army before it is asked to agree to a Vote in the Army Estimates.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: In view of this being a subject of such importance to the security of the State, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not proceed to take any Vote in any Estimates until hon. Members have had a week in which to consider his proposal.

MR. CARDWELL: I do not intend to ask for any decision of the House upon the subject until full time for consideration has been given. The first Vote in the Army Estimates will not be taken for at least a week after the day on which my statement will be made.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—
THE NEUTRAL POWERS AND THE TERMS OF PEACE.—QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government are acting in concert with other neutral Powers to secure terms of peace between France and Germany of such moderation as will insure the permanent tranquillity of Europe?

MR. GLADSTONE: As regards the steps that have been taken by Her Majesty's Government up to the present time, I may refer to the Papers laid upon the Table of the House, or I should rather say, which have been distributed among hon. Members this morning, to which I have only to add that on the 20th of January a Paper posterior to that collection of Papers was framed, in which a suggestion has been conveyed to the German Government that it might with great advantage make known to France the terms of peace upon which they propose to insist. I am not able to say whether any step has been taken by the Prussian Government in consequence of that communication; but with regard to the present and to the future I may state that we are not at this moment acting in concert with the other neutral Powers respecting the terms of peace to be agreed upon. In saying this, I do not in any way intend to recede from the views expressed on Thursday night that the terms of peace are matters of legitimate interest to the neutral Powers; but those who are the primary and chief authorities in framing the terms of peace are the two belligerents; and at the present moment we have no reason to believe that it is the desire of either of the belligerents that the neutral Powers should take any steps in the matter. Recollecting that we are now within a very few days of the time when a Representative Assembly will meet in France, which will in every sense be qualified to act for the people, I think that the hon. Member will agree with me that it is better not to press this matter further at the present moment.

QUEEN'S SPEECH.—HER MAJESTY'S
ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord OTHO FITZGERALD) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

I thank you for your loyal Address.

In your good wishes upon the Marriage of My Daughter I gratefully recognise a fresh proof of your attachment to My Throne and Person.

I receive with much satisfaction the assurance of your concurrence in My prayer that the present Armistice may result in an honourable and durable peace between the two great Nations now unhappily at war.

I earnestly trust that all your efforts for the promotion of the welfare of My People, and the security of My Empire, may be directed to a prosperous issue.

PRINCESS LOUISE.
THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, to make a proposal the same in terms and the same in substance which has been made on former similar occasions—namely, on the occasions offered by the marriages of the Princess Louis of Hesse and the Princess Christian. And I should have been very glad if it had been consistent with my duty to assume, without doubt, as the Government has been able to assume at the periods which I have named, that there would be an unanimous—either literally or substantially—acceptance of the proposal. I feel it to be a subject for regret that there should be any doubt—I do not say as to its acceptance by the House: of that I have no doubt, nor of its acceptance by a very decisive expression of opinion have I any doubt—but of the vote which any hon. Gentleman may feel disposed to give on such an occasion. Nor is it the House alone that would be disappointed, I think, if any real difficulty were to be interposed in the way of passing such a measure; for I am persuaded that the whole nation, with very rare exceptions, would regard with surprise and dissatisfaction the hesitation of Parliament to make the becoming and usual provision for a Princess of the Royal House of Her Majesty.

With respect, Sir, to the circumstances of the contemplated marriage between the Princess Louise and Lord Lorne, it is not necessary for me to dwell upon them at any length. The character of the Royal Bride is known to some of us by personal intercourse, to others by the voice which rumour carries forth; and I do not think that rumour has ever carried forth, in any case recorded in our modern history, impressions more satisfactory or more delightful than those which have been conveyed to the popular mind with respect to the Princess Louise. But happily, that is not a novelty in the records of our time, for the daughters of the Queen, for whom we have been formerly called to make a becoming provision, have had every claim upon our admiration and regard. But there is a novelty in the present instance, although I am persuaded that novelty can hardly be in the mind of any among us (or, if in any, it must be in the mind of a few only) a source of doubt or dissatisfaction,—it is that the Princess Louise is about to bestow her hand upon a British subject. Now, Sir, in the resolution which the Queen has taken that the absence of Royal rank shall not of itself, and in every case, form an insuperable bar to a suit for the hand of one of her daughters, she is not acting without the advice of responsible Ministers. But she has shown, in coming to such a resolution, another manifestation of that principle which has governed her life—the principle which has taught her, amid the pomp and splendour, and amid the duties and cares of Royalty, never to forget the womanly and motherly character. She has justly impressed on the mind of the country a belief that there is no mother throughout the wide expanse of her dominions to whom the personal happiness of her children is more intensely dear. Her object has been ever to choose, as husbands for her children, or to favour the choice of, persons upon all the points of whose character and, above all, upon whose governing principles she could entirely rely. Acting upon that rule, she has seen marriages of her daughters to foreign Princes, which have been to her a source of delight and satisfaction; and it is not from any disparagement of or disappointment in such marriages that in the present instance a different course is pursued. The real principle now is the same as it has been on each successive occasion—namely, the desire that the person who is honoured with the hand of the Princess Louise should be one in whose character her future destinies should, humanly speaking, be safe.

But anyone who doubts the prudence of the course now to be pursued may do well to reflect that if the Queen has been pleased, and if the Princess Louise has been pleased, to depart from the former practice, the practice so departed from can hardly be termed ancient. It was no unusual thing in the history of this country, but far otherwise, for persons of the Royal House to bestow their hands upon British subjects. And I must say that such a practice is agreeable to the usages and social system of the country. The feelings, habits, and convictions of the country are not altogether favourable to the formation of classes absolutely exclusive. We have a perpetual blending of class with class familiar to our daily experience. We see it in the intermingling of the titled aristocracy of the country with the untitled gentry, and of the untitled gentry with the middle classes; and this interlacing we all believe to be wholesome and beneficial, and not the least operative among the many sources of the happiness of the people and of the firmness of the social structure. I know no reason why such a principle should not be applicable to the highest class of all, in which we have not seen it recently applied; or why there should not occasionally be a descent, if so it is to be called, of the Royal Family itself into the ranks of the higher nobility. I will not dwell further upon the special circumstances of the marriage, because I rest confidently in the belief that they are calculated to give, and that they have given, very general satisfaction.

Now, Sir, as I think it is my duty to anticipate every reasonable, or even unreasonable, objection that, so far as I can divine—and I own that I find the task one of difficulty—may be made, or scruple that may be entertained, I proceed next to notice what I hardly think will form the subject of difficulty in the minds of anyone who reflects for a moment—namely, the amount of the provision I now ask the House to make. The annuity of £6,000 a year is now proposed to the Committee, and in the regular course the portion of £30,000 will be voted as one of the grants of the year. I do not think, whatever may be his political opinions or social position, that any Gentleman will consider this provision an immoderate one in connection with the position of the Royal Bride, and with the scale of living and expenditure in this country. But, in order to show that the hand of modern economy has not been idle, I may compare the provision made for the younger daughters of the Royal House of our time with that made at an earlier period for the younger daughters of George III. The Princess Augusta Sophia had an annuity, partly out of the Consolidated Fund, and partly out of the Civil List, of £15,000 a year; the Princess Elizabeth had £14,000 a year; the Princess Sophia had £13,000 a year; and the Princess Mary, Duchess of Gloucester, had £14,000 a year; besides which there was a similar sum voted for her husband. I will assume, therefore, for the present, that it is not on the amount of this provision that the controversy—and I confess I regard it as a somewhat unworthy and paltry controversy—can be raised. But certain questions may have occurred in the minds of hon. Gentlemen. It seems to be asked, are we now called upon to make provision in a case where provision has virtually been made already? That, I understand, is the doctrine which some are disposed to maintain. My contention is that no provision whatever has been made for this case. I know that a vague idea is entertained that the Queen has a large income, and that out of this it would be her duty to effect savings, like other parents, out of which her daughters should be competently endowed. But there is not the same power of regulating expenditure as in the case of private incomes, nor an equal facility, therefore, for storing annual receipt with a view to family arrangements. Undoubted, the Sovereign of this kingdom has a large income; but, although it is a large income, it is an income which, far more than any other large income in the country, is predetermined to special purposes; an income of which only very limited portions are under the control and discretion of the Sovereign. The nominal amount of the Sovereign's income, if we add together the Civil List and the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster, may be larger, possibly, than that of any subject, though there are a few among subjects who may come near it; but there are, undoubtedly, subjects in this country who have the real command over, and can expend at their free choice and pleasure, larger sums than are practically at the disposal of the Sovereign.

Gentlemen who study the structure of the Civil List Acts will perceive that Parliament studiously lays down the application of the monies granted to the Sovereign, and confines them to the special services for which they are destined. In truth, when an arrangement of this kind is made with a Sovereign, the most sanguine expectation commonly entertained by a rational Legislature is that the Sovereign shall, by good husbandry, remain in a position to keep strict faith with the people, and shall not come to Parliament from time to time making pleas on one ground or another to show the insufficiency of the provision, and to disturb the bargain made, by new demands for the same purpose upon the public purse. I need hardly remind the House that we are now in the 34th year of a reign during which on no single occasion has any such demand been made. The management of the Royal household, and the management of the Royal income, have set an example of economy and good order to all the families of the country. But the present question is whether there is any, the slightest, foundation for the belief some may entertain that it is the duty of the Sovereign to effect such savings out of the income of the Crown as will be sufficient to meet these purposes. Now, Sir, I will say that I believe that this is not only not the duty, but even that it is out of the power of the Sovereign. This is a matter that is governed by practice—I do not mean by a written rule of practice, I do not mean by a literal covenant—I mean that practice of honour and good understanding and loyalty, which arises out of, and which is irrefragably confirmed by, a long and unmistakable course of precedent. The House knows very well that it is only within the present century that, after much labour directed to that end, it has been found practicable to come to a close, intelligible, and satisfactory arrangement with regard to the support of the Royal dignity and person. At the commencement of every reign a sum is allotted by an Act called the Civil List Act for that purpose. Does that Civil List Act contemplate a provision being made out of the funds it grants for the maintenance of the Royal children? I say it does not; and the proof that it does not is that, under all circumstances, it has been the established and understood practice of every Government to come to Parliament from time to time, and to ask for some separate provision to be made on behalf of the Royal children. The expense of the Royal children in their youth—in their youth I include the period up to their marriage or their attaining full age—has been borne by the Sovereign without any appeal to Parliament; but the practice has uniformly been that when the Royal children pass into independent life, whether by marriage or by attaining full age, or at whatever precise date, to apply to Parliament to make a provision. I fully admit that I am not prepared to quote anything in the nature of a written agreement on the subject; but I am prepared to affirm that the argument of practice has in this case the force of a demonstration. Now, in 1830, the Civil List of William IV. was fixed at £435,000 a year, and no better period for an economical precedent could be taken. I doubt if even a period as good could be found. I do not say that the commencement of the present reign has not also been excellent in that respect; but certainly there never was a time when there was a greater desire evinced on both sides of the House to draw the reins tightly and to prevent anything like extravagance in public expenditure than there was at the commencement of the reign of William IV. The sum then assigned to the Civil List was £435,000. But the sum given on the accession of the Queen was reduced to £385,000. And why? I think it evident that the amount was reduced because, in the case of William IV. there had been a Queen Consort, whereas Queen Victoria was unmarried at the commencement of her reign, and the contemplation was that if Her Majesty were to marry, then the time would arrive for Parliament to consider what increase of expenditure would necessarily follow upon any change of establishment and life which would so be produced. Shortly after, Her Majesty was happily married. And what then happened? A new proposal was made to Parliament, and a Vote was taken on behalf of the Prince Consort as the husband of the Queen, in addition to the Civil List. Therefore, from the Civil List, originally fixed in 1830, a reduction was made in 1837. It was made when the Queen was a maiden, it was altered when the Queen was married. It is impossible to have a stronger attestation of the principle upon which these matters have been uniformly regulated.

Now, the fact that there is a uniform practice of this kind — what I should call a loyal and honourable understanding and practice—is quite conclusive; but, at the same time, I would beg the House to consider that the contract or arrangement is no very unfavourable one to the public. When we granted the Civil List, at the commencement of the reign, we did not grant it without an equivalent. We received in return those lands which formed the endowment of the Crown. It would, at least, be not too much to say that in a country governed by a monarchy the Crown ought to have the largest of all personal endowments. Accordingly, the Crown of this country has had, and so the Crown of this country would at this moment have had, an income much exceeding any private income, if the estates of the Crown had been used from time to time as those belonging to private individuals are — namely, solely for the purpose of extracting from them the greatest amount of profit it is possible to gain. Still, it so happens that, at the present day, the net revenue of the estates of the Crown has just reached the sum paid to Her Majesty under the Civil List Act. The sum paid from the Consolidated Fund on account of the Civil List Act amounts to £385,000, and the net sum paid into the Exchequer as the proceeds of these Crown lands is estimated for the present or coming year to amount to £385,000 also. Therefore, there is no very great or glaring difference in the case thus viewed. I know, of course, that there are some other emoluments enjoyed by the Crown, and that various other grants have also been made to members of the Royal Family; but, on the other hand, we should look at the valuable acquirements made by the people in the Parks of London and the Parks in the neighbourhood, which have been devoted for every practical purpose to the benefit of the nation. I ask, what do you believe would be the income of the Crown if the Parks of London, instead of being placed under particular provisions for the public good, had been cut up into building lots, and if the Parks in the neighbourhood of London had been, or were now to be, laid out for the erection of villas—that is, if this land had been used by and for the interest of the Crown for years, or rather for generations past, as it would have been used if it had belonged to private proprietors? I believe, though I have no right to give an estimate with authority, that in that case the annual independent income of the Crown would, perhaps, be not less at this moment than a million sterling.

But the truth is, Sir, that this is a very narrow view of the case to take. There is a much deeper and a much broader question involved. The competent support—not the lavish and extravagant, but the competent and becoming support—of the Crown and the Royal Family is an important and an indispensable part of our political system. It is not the money paid back from the Crown lands into the Exchequer that forms the real equivalent to the public. That equivalent is to be found in the additional security given for the political benefits and blessings that we enjoy. We have not far to look to learn how difficult it is on this side of the Atlantic to bestow upon democratic and popular forms of government on a large scale the conditions of stability, and how difficult also it is to root monarchical forms of government in the affections of a nation where unhappily the union of tradition may not have been altogether favourable to such an association. And we have seen, too, how instability of succession places dynasties in this position—that the interior policy of a country becomes subservient, almost of necessity, to the interests of family, and that questions of peace and war, if pursued to their first causes, may be too often referable to considerations of what would be popular, or what would be unpopular, in reference to the interests of particular families. I trust, and I do not doubt, that this House, acting with that wisdom which guides it upon every great constitutional question, will perceive that we should commit the grossest of all errors if we were to be content with entering into minute pecuniary calculations upon a subject of this nature; if we were to regard this simply as a question whether or not a grant should be made on mere pecuniary grounds as matter of account, and not as one affecting the happiness and welfare of the people of this country, for which the existence of an ancient and deep-rooted monarchy constitutes one, at least, among the best and most effectual guarantees.

I admit, indeed, that there is something to be said from another point of view. The practice of the House has been on all occasions to make those grants with cheerfulness—almost with eagerness. I think, unless my memory deceives me, I have heard a large number of Members in this House object to the grants more on the ground of their being too small than as being too large; and I am afraid that objections now taken may hereafter tend to promote a reaction in the direction of excess. But these Votes have on all occasions within my recollection been liberally and cheerfully voted, and if they were no longer to be liberally and cheerfully voted the act of asking for them would become intolerable to any person of high spirit and of due self-respect. It would be impossible for the Sovereign—it would be impossible not for a Sovereign only, but for any person endowed with a just sense of duty, and, therefore, with that self-respect which is a part of duty, to enter into angry controversy with Parliament, should Parliament be so disposed, on such questions. And what would be the consequence? We should have to change our system. At the commencement of a reign, besides giving to the Lord Steward what he requires, and giving to the Lord Chamberlain what he requires, and so forth under the various heads, we should have to do what is done in so many private families—we should have to provide for all these distant contingencies and secure beforehand a becoming income to the children of the Sovereign. The effect of that would be—first, a great diminution of the moral control of Parliament over the Royal Family; and, secondly, a great diminution of the moral control of Royal parents over their rising families of children. It is, to my mind, open to much doubt whether it can be in the interests of a State that such a change should be made. And, undoubtedly, it is not in the pecuniary interests of the Sovereign that the present system is pursued. It exposes the Sovereign—it exposes the younger members of her family, who have never known reproach in any form—to idle vituperation, or, if vituperation is too harsh a word, to idle objections and to cavil. No doubt for the Sovereign it would be convenient enough that all these provisions should be made beforehand. But the present system, whatever it may be in other respects, is a system national and popular in its spirit—a system founded on those free relations of generous confidence which ought always to govern the conduct of the Sovereign of this country towards the Parliament. The Sovereign confides and trusts that when a reasonable and becoming demand is made, the occasion having arisen, Parliament will not hesitate for a moment to meet that demand; and Parliament has ever acted in such a manner as to justify this confidence by facts. I am sure that no one who considers the case will fail to see that this method under which from time to time, as mature age is attained by members of the Royal Family, or as marriage is about to be contracted, Parliament is asked to make proper provision, is a system conceived in the interest of the people, and likewise one which can only work as long as harmonious and cordial relations are maintained between the Sovereign and the Parliament. Sir, I think that if that be so it is needless for me to go further in the discussion of this important matter. It may be that some Gentlemen have discovered elements in it which have not met our view; but confident as I am that we are acting according to the principle of good faith, according to old and uniform precedent, and according to sound policy, I have not the least hesitation in putting, Sir, into your hands a Resolution which I am confident will command the assent of an overwhelming majority of the House, and which has for its object to make, in view of her approaching marriage, the usual provision for the daughter of the Queen.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That the annual sum of Six Thousand Pounds be granted to

Her Majesty, out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, the said Annuity to be settled on Her Royal Highness Princess Louise, for her life, in such manner as Her Majesty shall think proper, and to commence from the date of the Marriage of Her Royal Highness with the Marquis of Lorne.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to consider the best means of promoting the Despatch of Public Business in this House, said, as he had already detained the House at perhaps too great length, he would take care now not to fall into a similar error. He thought there was such a general concurrence as to the necessity of appointing this Committee that it would be best to avoid on the present occasion all discussion as to details, and he would merely remind hon. Members that the proposal had grown out of an occasion of a very grave nature. On a subject of a most critical character which arose for discussion in the course of last year they had the spectacle of Members rising in their places to require the withdrawal of Strangers. Some approved the proceeding on the part of Members who so used their privilege, others questioned the propriety of it; but almost everyone owned that it created an absolute necessity for the consideration of the subject. The general pressure of business on the House made it also desirable that a Committee should be appointed, who would have an opportunity of ascertaining the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, who was the highest authority, and other high authorities connected with the working and management of the business of the House, and he had therefore great confidence in proposing the Motion of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the best means of promoting the Despatch of Public Business in this House.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK rose to move an Amendment to the effect that it is not expedient to restrict further the privileges afforded to private Members by the present arrangements for the business of the House. As it had fallen to his lot last year to do his utmost to prevent the rights of private Members from being infringed upon, he had felt it his duty to place this Amendment upon the Paper for the purpose of obtaining some expression of opinion to the effect that, if any change was to be made, those rights and privileges which rendered that House the most respected of all popular Assemblies should in no way be diminished. He had been still further actuated by the recollection that no Committee had been appointed under the right hon. Gentleman without further restricting those privileges, and also by a report which had been widely spread as to the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman and his Government. Besides, he had read an article in a certain Review with which the right hon. Gentleman was familiar, which had gone deeply into this question; and though it could not certainly have been written by any Member of Her Majesty's Government, because none of them would disclose the policy likely to be adopted by himself and his Colleagues, yet it was known that the right hon. Gentleman had intimate relations with that Review, and the article in question might, to use a foreign phrase, be fairly looked upon as having been "communicated." In this article considerable onslaught was made on the privileges of private Members. In the first place, it was suggested that the power of putting Questions in Committee of Supply should be taken away, and then that some foreign invention called the clôture should be used. With regard to the first point, he wished to refer the right hon. Gentleman to the last debate on the Report of the Committee of 1861. Certain Resolutions were at that time proposed for the adoption of the House by Lord Palmerston, the principle of which was to take away from private Members their right to Thursday, giving the Government Thursday and Monday evenings, and also to deprive private Members of their privilege of putting Questions on the Adjournment of the House; while in exchange Friday was made an Order day, and Supply was put at the head of the Orders. On that occasion Lord Palmerston said that—

"It was more in unison with the fundamental principles of the Constitution that when Supply is proposed it shall be open to every Member to discuss any subject."

Well, if that were so, and if he did not get

from the right hon. Gentleman a distinct pledge that this vital principle of the Constitution was not to be interfered with, he would be disposed to divide the House against the Motion. He came now to another point, that of Morning Sittings. In 1867 and 1868 his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire introduced a new plan of Morning Sittings which interfered greatly with the rights and privileges of private Members. He believed his right hon. Friend now considered he had committed a great error of judgment, and would gladly retrace his steps. What had been the result? By making the Morning Sitting commence at 2 instead of 12, and end at 7 instead of 4, private Members lost at least 2½ hours a day on an average. Besides, there was the great inconvenience that professional men and men of business could not attend so well under the new plan. Then there was this further inconvenience—that mischievous people came down to the House, and in the Session of 1869 the House was counted out by these mischievous Gentlemen no fewer than four times, and three times last Session. Apart from the actual inconvenience of Morning Sittings, other encroachments had been made on the privileges of private Members. Until the year 1869 the Morning Sittings rarely commenced before the middle of the month of June; but in that year, on the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), they were begun at a much earlier period—on the 4th of May—and were continued almost till the end of the Session. Again, last Session, the right hon. Gentleman, on the 31st of March, announced to the House that on the following day he intended to move for Morning Sittings, and he continued these Morning Sittings on every Tuesday and Friday till the Easter vacation. And for what reason? That he might remedy the blunder he had committed in his policy with regard to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman was a powerful Minister, with great command over his supporters, and, possessing a large majority, might find other means of saving the public time besides curtailing the privileges now enjoyed by independent Members. Unless some satisfactory promise were given by the Government on that subject, he should press his Amendment to a Division.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the first word "That," in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient to restrict further the privileges afforded to private Members by the present arrangements for the Business of the House,"—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck,) —instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he believed he was able to give the hon. Member every satisfaction that he required. He appeared to think that the Government had some foregone conclusion, some formidable proposal to make, which they would be able to carry through the Committee to the great disadvantage of private Members. The Government knew perfectly well that it would be impossible to make any alteration in the mode of conducting the Public Business unless the consent of the House was freely given to such alteration. Consequently, their desire was that the most competent Committee that could be formed should be appointed to consider the whole matter without prejudice. Government influence had nothing whatever to do with it. The conclusion at which the Committee arrived would be their spontaneous act. Under these circumstances, he thought the hon. Gentleman would see that it would not be well to tie up the hands of the Committee in any way.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that having been a Member of the Committee of 1861, he had naturally watched the effect of the recommendations of that Committee, as they had come into operation after receiving the sanction and approval of the House. On several occasions previous to the passing of the Reform Bill, he had entertained some doubt whether the House had duly considered its own dignity in framing the Standing Orders, which it had adopted, and since the passing of that Bill he had become convinced that the Standing Orders ought to be considerably changed, for the purpose of remedying the confusion which prevailed in the transaction of Public Business. In the reformed House there was at first a strong inclination to curtail debates on great and vital questions, while the practice had grown up of hon. Members leaving the House almost empty during certain hours of the night. He was sorry to say that sometimes when questions of the greatest interest had been before the House, those who ought to have led the Opposition had been absent for hours. There were instances of the House having been counted out during the well-known dinner hour. He thought the time had come when the House ought to consider whether it would not conform its proceedings in some measure to the well-known social habits of its Members. He considered it unbecoming that the conduct of Public Business should be left in the hands of a small minority from half-past 7 to half-past 8 in the evening. He had no doubt that it was this consideration which induced the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire to propose Morning Sittings to commence at 2 p.m., but the proposal was too absolute, and the interval chosen was too long; it might be possible, however, to make some modification of that principle, so as to prevent the House from neglecting matters of great importance in the absence of hon. Members during the dinner hour. He agreed with the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) that the privileges of independent Members ought not to be curtailed. There had been carelessness on the part of the great body of the House on the subject of Questions put before the commencement of the regular business of the House began each afternoon. One of the objects of the Committee of 1861 was the limitation of the enormous number of Questions on Fridays on going into Committee of Supply, but it seemed to him (Mr. Newdegate) that now this excess of Questions prevailed whenever the House sat. The House had virtually no control over the Questions which were asked; he had heard Questions put which were most unworthy of the attention of the House, and yet the House had no opportunity of expressing its opinion either for or against these Questions. Before that habit grew up hon. Members were in the habit of submitting Motions, and then the House had the opportunity of expressing their opinion upon them, but the House was quite helpless in the case of Questions. Another inconvenience was the late hour at which the important business was sometimes brought on—an hour when those advanced in years were unable to attend in their places, when they were exhausted by the labours of the day. If any hon. Member watched his opportunity and pressed on his business between 1 and 2 in the morning, there was no resource for those who objected, but to move adjournments, and to incur the imputation of faction. Besides this, it was impossible for the newspapers to report debates that occurred after a certain hour. Business of importance was thus often debated without the country knowing anything of the discussion, although the public were under the impression that they were fully cognizant of all the Parliamentary proceedings which took place. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for fulfilling his promise of last year, by proposing that the House should have another opportunity of re-considering the Standing Order by which its debates were regulated, and concurred with the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) in thinking that the great body of the House ought to resist any further restrictions upon its independent action. He thought it necessary to the dignity of the House that it should endeavour to adopt such rules as would restrict the obtrusion of Questions over which the House had not adequate command, and by some expression of opinion enjoin that every Member should pay proper attention to the dignity of the House.

MR. G. B. GREGORY avowed his readiness, as a private Member, to waive some portion of the privileges which he now enjoyed; and he would do this the more readily that one result of the privileges private Members now enjoyed was that he had frequently been compelled to listen to long discussions in which he felt little interest, and which led to no practical result, up to 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, because the interests of his constituents were involved in legislation, often of a very experimental character, attempted at that hour. Upon Members who were engaged in mercantile or commercial pursuits during the day attendance at such hours as those pressed with great severity—especially when it was remembered that they were expected to be again at business the following day. It was really becoming a question whether hon. Members could hope to combine with their own proper avocations the duties of a Member of the Legislature. The appointment of a Committee, he feared, would have the effect of delaying any remedy to the end of this Session or the beginning of the next. Might it not, therefore, be possible to apply some remedy at once? If there were an understanding that no new business should be taken after 12 o'clock at night it would be possible to close the general debate at 11 o'clock. There was no good reason why this should not be done. Something could be gained at the other end of the Sitting, for Private Business was frequently got through at, or shortly after, 4 o'clock; yet the Speaker was obliged to remain patiently in the Chair till half-past 4 o'clock before the Public Business could commence. It might also be practicable to place some limits on the time occupied by speakers.

MR. HORSMAN said, he had anticipated, from the terms of the Notice given, that the Motion to be proposed by the Government would be similar in spirit to the speech just made by the hon. Member opposite—that was to say, that it would proceed upon the assumption that the forms of the House were used by private Members, if not for the purpose of obstructing, at least with the effect of impeding Government legislation, and that it was accordingly desirable to appoint a Committee to ascertain whether it was not possible further to curtail the privileges of private Members, and to increase the opportunities of carrying Government measures. But he now learned distinctly from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that they had no object, purpose, or intention of restricting, and would not lend themselves in any way further to restrict, the privileges of the House or the opportunities of debate—

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman is putting words into my mouth. I did not say that "we never would lend ourselves." What I did was to suggest the appointment of a Committee to investigate the subject, and that the whole subject should be left to the consideration of the Committee.

MR. HORSMAN said, that on the last occasion when a Motion on the subject was made from the Government Bench, he moved an Amendment similar to that of the hon. Member for Whitehaven, knowing that frequent attempts had been made with the result of removing some of the safeguards that had been established for the protection of the minority. If any intention existed to restrict the privileges of Members it would only have been fair to state it openly, and he had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would have done so. Understanding that the Government had no proposition of that kind to make, and that when the Committee reported hon. Members would be perfectly free to express their opinions in case any changes hostile to the privileges of the House should be recommended, he thought it advisable that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and that the Committee should be appointed without opposition. As far as private Members were concerned, any change, he thought, ought to be in the direction of restoration rather than restriction.

MR. G. BENTINCK expressed his entire concurrence in the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that any change which might be made ought to be rather in the direction of increasing than of decreasing the rights of private Members, which had been attacked and impaired on former occasions. If there was one question more important than another, it was the freedom and independence of Members. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government told them that he had not arrived at any foregone conclusion. He was quite prepared to assume that the right hon. Gentleman was the very soul of candour; that he never at any time in his life had the slightest feeling of reticence, but was always prepared to lay before the House every thought and feeling of his mind. But why, then, did the right hon. Gentleman move the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the business and proceedings of the House? Was it possible that he could have done this without having arrived at some foregone conclusion? Was it to be supposed that he had made this Motion without thinking that some change was required; or was it likely that the right hon. Gentleman, with his grasp of mind and attention to business, had never considered in what direction he would like the change to be? Gentlemen who were in the House of Commons formerly at the same time as himself, would remember the attacks which were then made on the privileges of independent Members by previous Governments, and the promises then made which had never been redeemed. In 1861 there was a change in the order of business, with the distinct understanding that Supply was to be put down on Friday nights for the purpose of enabling private Members to introduce any subject which they might wish to discuss, and the much lamented noble Lord (Lord Palmerston), then at the head of the Government, gave a pledge which, no doubt, he fully meant to carry out, that the Government would always keep a House on Friday nights for the purpose. Subsequent Governments, however, had failed to redeem the pledge, and the consequence was that Friday nights were virtually lost to private Members. He much regretted that a clearer explanation had not been given by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He most deeply regretted—and he was sure every Member of the House would deeply regret—the absence from the House of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who had always exercised great control over the proceedings of the Government itself, and of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of it. He could not think that if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had been present now, acting in the spirit which had always made him one of the most able champions of the liberties of the House, he would have failed to raise his voice and to protest against any inroad being made on the rights of private Members; and he trusted that when the matter again came under consideration the House would have the benefit of the right hon. Gentleman's presence. For his own part, he did not believe the Committee could meet without coming to some conclusion adverse to the rights of private Members. As happened 10 or 12 years ago, when this subject was investigated, the inquiry would result in a fight between those who held and those who expected Office against the independent Members of the House of Commons, their object being to prevent any voice but their own being heard. Of course, he could not anticipate the decision of the Committee; but he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven would not press his Motion to a division. The composition of the Committee ought, however, to be closely scrutinized, and he trusted that when the Report was brought up the House would be prepared to defend its own independence.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that as matters stood at present, it was very difficult for a private Member to carry a measure through the House. He himself had made the attempt, having spent nearly half last Session in the endeavour to get a Burial Bill passed; but, considering how slow was its progress, he believed he should be buried himself before he attained his object. Indeed, so many difficulties were in the way of a private Member, that the result would be that all opposed measures would have to proceed from the Government. Now, was this desirable? The remedy he would suggest was that some check should be put on the practice of making Motions to report Progress and to adjourn the debate. He should be exceedingly sorry to put any unfair restraint on the rights of the minority; but when, as happened last Session, 15 Motions were made in the course of one night for the adjournment of the debate, and six to report Progress, and when two hours were spent after midnight in debating whether there should be any debate at all, it was high time a check should be put on so pernicious a practice.

MR. RATHBONE said, that much prominence had been given in the speeches just delivered to the rights and feelings of private Members in reference to this matter; but the first duty of hon. Members was to legislate for the advantage of the country, and he thought no one who had had much experience in that House could avoid coming to the conclusion that Bills were often hurried through in a by no means creditable manner. Now, he did not conceive that the mere retention of certain antiquated forms ought to be regarded as of equal importance with the turning out of measures in a creditable and satisfactory form. He had read the Reports of the Committees which inquired into the forms he had just referred to, and also the suggestions made by the witnesses examined before them; and he found that the late Speaker, the present Speaker, and all the most experienced Members of the House, concurred in the opinion that many forms observed by the House were perfectly useless, and might be abolished with great advantage to the legislation of the country. He hoped the Committee would not be fettered by any pledge as to maintaining the rights of private Members, or the old forms of the House; but that they would be left perfectly free to consider the best means of conducting the legislation of the country.

MR. ANDERSON said, that as a Member who attended the House at all hours, however late, he thought he had a right to say a few words on this question. It appeared to him there were but two methods by which it was possible to gain more time for the transaction of the Public Business of the House. One, which, perhaps, would not be relished by many Members, was to give the House a certain power of limiting the length of speeches; but of the usefulness of the other method a very good illustration would be given that evening, when the House was about to enter upon a discussion of an Elementary Education Bill for Scotland. It would be in the remembrance of the House that this very ground was gone over two Sessions ago, when this House, after much and careful labour, completed and passed a Scotch Education Bill; but all its work was thrown away and lost because the measure reached the Lords so late in the Session that they declined to take it into consideration at all. The remedy he would suggest for such a state of things was to provide that, when a new Parliament had not been elected in the meantime, Bills passed in this House towards the end of one Session should be taken up to the other House at the beginning of the next. The present system not only caused much loss of time, but gave rise to a great deal of hasty and improper legislation, for no other reason than that Bills might be got through the House in time to be considered by the other.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that after the discussion which had taken place, and after learning that it was not the right hon. Gentleman's intention to limit the rights of private Members, he should not press his Amendment to a Division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. BRUCE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Regulation of Mines, said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the main points of difference between the present measure and the one which he introduced last Session. After the Bill was brought into this House last Session, a noble Lord (Lord Kinnaird), who had long presided over the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the health of those who work in metalliferous mines, which were not dealt with in the Government measure, introduced a Bill relating to those mines, and giving effect to the recommendations of the Commissioners. Thereupon he (Mr. Bruce) undertook, on the part of the Government, to introduce, as Amendments in the Bill, substantially all the provisions of the measure respecting metalliferous mines. The present Bill would, therefore, deal not only with coal mines and iron mines worked in connection with coal mines, but with all the mines in the country. To the suggestions made by several hon. Members he had given the most careful consideration, and the result was that in one or two not unimportant respects he had found it advisable to modify the Bill. The Committee, which sat for two years investigating this subject, recommended that the most important general rule of all those which affected mines — that relating to ventilation — should be modified in an important manner. The present rule was that all coal mines, and iron-stone mines in connection with coal mines, should have an amount of ventilation sufficient under ordinary circumstances to dilute the noxious gases. Some Inspectors found it difficult, however, to obtain convictions, as the magistrates frequently found that ventilation, which in the opinion of the Inspectors was inadequate, was sufficient for safety under ordinary circumstances. Consequently it was proposed by the Select Committee to lay the onus probandi on the owners of mines and their agents, instead of on the other side. This change was greatly opposed by several Members, and not supported by any. He had consulted the Inspectors of coal mines, and the result was the conclusion that, on the whole, it was best to retain the law in its present form. The Select Committee felt the greatest difficulty in dealing with the education of miners; but they were agreed that the present regulations were imperfect, and that the provisions made with the object of securing the education of miners were illusory. The law, as it now stood, provided that a child of 10 years of age, who could pass an examination in reading and writing, might be employed in a mine; but it took no security for the character of the examination, such as providing that it should be conducted by a certificated master, or fixing a certain standard of proficiency; and the consequence was that in many cases a most imperfect knowledge of reading and writing was certified as being sufficient. As soon as the examination was passed, a youth was employed without restriction as to hours, and that under circumstances most adverse to any kind of culture. Could anything be conceived more miserable than the condition of a boy of tender age shut up for 12 hours at a time in a dark cavern, with "knowledge at one entrance quite shut out," and altogether cut off from many opportunities of acquiring intelligence possessed by boys who spent their time above ground, even although they were not at school? The Select Committee considered this matter fully, and especially whether it would be possible to introduce the half-time system; but, on the whole, they arrived at the conclusion that it was best to exclude children altogether from the mines until they were 12 years of age, trusting that up to that age they would take advantage of the educational facilities now to be extended to them by the Act of last year, and believing that, if this exclusion were carried out, it would be unnecessary to impose any further restriction. The Factory Acts and the Workshops Regulation Act provided that children under 13, who were at work, should be secured a certain immunity from extreme labour, and a certain amount of education; but as, in the case of miners, it was proposed to relieve children from work up to the age of 12, it was considered less necessary to put them under the half-time system for the remaining year, which, indeed, would create an amount of inconvenience out of proportion to the good effected. He stated last year that of all the amendments suggested the most practical seemed to be one offered by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Akroyd), supplemented by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), which was that children should be allowed to enter the mines at 10, but that their hours of labour should be limited to three days a week, and that they should have at least 10 hours' education in school every week. He had received from the Association of Miners a proposition of a new and startling nature, which was that no child should be allowed to enter a colliery until he reached the age of 12, and not even then unless he passed a certain examination which would secure proficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and that for young persons of from 12 to 16 years of age, the labour should be limited to eight hours a day; and that these young persons should attend school for a certain number of hours a week. He did not doubt the perfect sincerity with which the Association endeavoured to promote the education of the children of their own class; but he was bound to say there seemed to him to be something more than a desire for education in this proposition, for it was known that many of the Trades Unions had made it one of their objects to prevent the employment of children so as to keep up the rate of wages, by keeping down the number of persons employed; and when such a proposition as this was made we must see in it some object other than the advance of education. The age at which children were allowed to begin work was, under the Factory Acts, 8 years; but he thought there was ample justification for treating the mining population differently, and fixing the earliest age at a more advanced period of life. With this difference, he thought it was just and fair to adopt, as far as possible, the lines that had been already laid down; and he, therefore, proposed to allow children to be employed at the age of 10, to limit their employment to three days a week, to require that they should attend school 10 hours a week, and to maintain these restrictions up to the age of 13. With respect to the hours of labour, the propositions of the Bill were substantially the same as those of the Bill of last year, and it was then proposed to limit the labour of all boys under 16 to 56 hours a week, and at the same time to provide that under no circumstances should a boy be kept down a pit more than 12 hours a day, including an hour and a half for meals and rest. The work in mines was not, generally speaking, of a fatiguing character, and he believed that the work done by a child in a factory was, on the whole, more tiring than the work done by a child in a colliery, which was often confined to the watching of doors and opening and closing them as required. Another alteration in the Bill would, he believed, be deemed satisfactory. It was put forward as an injustice last year that miners should be liable to imprisonment, without the option of a fine, for certain offences, and that agents and others, often as culpable, should be punished only by the imposition of fines. There was undoubtedly a distinction between the two cases; for the offence of the workman was often clear and definite, while that of the agent was more indirect and complicated, and less easy to prove. He was still of opinion that both workmen and agents should be subject to imprisonment if their conduct deserved it; but he proposed that there should be a right of appeal whenever a man was sentenced to imprisonment without the alternative of paying a fine. Those were the only alterations of any importance which had been made in the measure, and the minor alterations, upon which he had not touched, it would be more convenient to discuss when they got into Committee. He had been unable to meet the wish of the hon. Member for Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities (Dr. Lyon Playfair), that some provision should be made for the examination of agents. He had given the subject a good deal of consideration, and he had arrived at the conclusion that it was far more dangerous than advantageous for the Government to interfere in the matter by attempting to influence the choice of agents. The defects that existed in the management of collieries did not arise so much from a want of education on the part of the managers, as from a want of attention to duties, and from failure to use the means at their disposal for securing the safety of those intrusted to their charge; and these were failures against which no examination could provide, while no examination could test the energy, vigilance, presence of mind, which constitute in the eyes of the employer the highest merits of the agent, and he therefore had abstained from making any provisions for conducting such examinations.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Regulation of Mines, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary BRUCE and Mr. SEAW LEPFVER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 16.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and extend the provisions of the Law of Scotland on the subject of Education, said, that in doing so, he would not take up the time of the House in vague generalities on the importance of the subject, but would proceed at once to explain the leading provisions of the measure. He might, however, be permitted to say for himself that, in undertaking to prepare and introduce a measure on the subject of Education for Scotland, he did so under a full impression of its importance and of the difficulties he should have to encounter. He did not forget the unsuccessful result of previous attempts, made by more able hands than his; and if, nevertheless, he was not despairing, but hopeful, it was because of the changes which had been wrought in men's minds on the subject. Men's minds had become more deeply impressed with its importance, and those political and ecclesiastical considerations, which, to the regret of every good man, had been permitted to obstruct the progress of the education of the people, had been modified or moderated. Those hon. Members who had noticed the title of the Bill would have observed the contrast which it presented to the title of the measure of education for England which was passed last Session. The difference was not merely one in the point of words, but one which indicated a real difference between the condition of Scotland as compared with that of England in the matter of education. In England, as befitted so great, prosperous, and wealthy a country, there was splendid and munificently endowed provision for the higher and the highest education; but until the measure of last Session was passed, the law of England made no provision for the elementary education of all children of the country. In Scotland the matter stood very differently. There the foundations or endowments for the higher or the highest education were few in number and inconsiderable in amount; but, from a very remote period indeed, the law of Scotland had made some compulsory provision for the primary, and, to a considerable extent, for the secondary, education of the people. The burgh schools were coeval with the erection of the Royal burghs. It had ever been considered that one of the purposes for which burghs were erected, charters, privileges, and lands granted to them, was to promote the education of the community. The name given to burgh property was significant as signifying the purposes to which it was applicable; for the name by which it was legally and technically known was "the common good." He repeated that the education of the young had ever been regarded, and was now regarded, by the law of Scotland, as a "common good," to which the property of the community was legally applicable; and he would take leave to say further that any administrators of such property who were neglectful of education were neglectful of their legal duty. Burgh schools having their origin in the law to which he referred, and having, as he had stated, existed from the very earliest period—as far back as the institution of corporations and burghs—had so continued to the present time. The law upon the subject had, no doubt, been very largely evaded; but, nevertheless, in the greater number of the burghs of Scotland there was a burgh school, and in most of them some provision was made for the maintenance of the burgh schools out of the "common good" or corporation property of the burgh. As burgh schools were included in the provisions of this Bill, he might perhaps be permitted to make a few further observations in respect to them. They were not rate-supported. They were maintained partly by the contributions from the burgh funds—which, however, were very small—and partly and chiefly by fees paid by the pupils who attended them. In almost all of them—indeed, he believed with only two exceptions, the High School in Edinburgh and the Aberdeen Academy—elementary education was provided, commencing even with the learning of the alphabet. In most of them also instruction was given in the higher branches of knowledge; so that pupils were prepared to proceed even to the Universities. In fact, they constituted a connecting link between the parish schools and the Universities of Scotland. They were attended by children and young men of all classes, from the lowest to the higher middle class, and in some burgh schools—or, the High School at Edinburgh being taken to be the chief representative—the children of the very highest classes of the country attended. They were important public institutions; the only public schools in which legal provision was made for education within burghs, for the system of parochial schools did not extend to burghs. These schools were under the management of the town councils; and, judging from the Report of the Commissioners on Education, the management had, upon the whole, been satisfactory.

He had now to bring under the notice of the House the existing state of the law of Scotland on the subject of education in the country districts. In parishes, the provision was made by means of parish schools. These schools were of very ancient origin. The law of Scotland made provision for education through the country generally, by a compulsory Act, so long ago as the 15th century. That Act imposed penalties upon all parishes which did not provide a suitable education for the children within their bounds. The first statute establishing parish schools—not upon precisely their present footing, but really establishing, or attempting to establish, a school in every parish—was the Act of 1633. The subsequent Act of 1696 placed the parish schools substantially upon the footing on which they now stood. The next statute was the Act of 1803, in the reign of George III.; and to complete the statement of the legislation on the subject, the last statute necessary to notice was passed in the year 1861. The parish schools, the House would be good enough to understand, were public rate-supported schools—the legal provision for their establishment and maintenance was a rating of landed property in the parishes, with a relief to the heritors to the extent of one-half from their tenants. The management of these schools was, down to the year 1803, when the statute of George III. was passed, in the rated body—that is to say, those liable to rates for educational purposes had a share in the management of the schools. By the statute of 1803, the managing body was decreased in number by a provision requiring that those admitted to the management should be possessed of a certain specified rental, though prior to that all who contributed to the support of the school had a voice in the management.

Now, in order to put the House satisfactorily in possession of the condition of those schools at the present time, it was necessary he should explain the area of rating or assessment for their support. This rendered it necessary to explain an expression frequently heard in the discussions on Scotch education—he alluded to the expression “valued rent.” That had become a technical expression, having a technical meaning. Originally, it had no other meaning than the words express; it signified the real value or rent of every man’s estate. But the valuations in Scotland were somewhat numerous at first, but had subsequently been discontinued, or renewed after a very long lapse of years. The first valuation of which they had any account was in 1280, the next in 1327. It was doubtful if there was any revision of this last in 1365; but there certainly was in 1424. The next notice they had of a valuation of the lands in Scotland was that in the time of the Usurpation. In the year 1656 the land tax was imposed upon the landed proprietors according to the value of their estates; and there was some reason to suppose that there was at that time a revision of the valuation. In the year 1667 there was another law imposing the land tax in Scotland, which required that it should be imposed according to the former valuation, where equal and just, with power to the Commissioners to rectify it where they considered rectification necessary. He believed there was no rectification at all;

and the rolls made out with a view to the revision of the land tax under the law of 1667 had continued in operation for the collection of the tax ever since, the estates which were entered in the year 1667 standing there still at the value or rents originally set down. So in process of time the valuations entered in the rolls came to be called the "valued rent" of the land. It was hardly necessary to say that these could not in the present day be regarded as anything approaching a just valuation of the lands. In the first place, the rolls did not include all the lands in Scotland, because there had been parts of estates sold, and the "valued rents" not divided, although there was provision made for division as between the different proprietors; and the result was that a large amount of the landed property in Scotland was not on the rolls, or, to express it technically, was not "valued rented" at all. Nevertheless, the valuation contained in that roll—the "stent" roll as it is called—had continued down to the present day from considerations of convenience, and, in order to avoid expense and the other unpleasant incidents of re-valuation, it had been adopted as the rule for the imposition of a great variety of assessments under the local taxation system. It had not been adopted upon any other principle or from any other consideration that he was aware of. This state of things continued with respect to a great variety of taxes down to the year 1854, and continued now with respect to the assessments for the maintenance of the schools, churches, manse, and other matters subject to parochial taxation of that kind. In the year 1696, when the statute was passed placing parish schools upon their present footing, the heritors were directed to assess themselves according to their "valued rent"—that is to say, according to the rental value of their respective properties; and the ancient valuation was taken as the rule, and had unfortunately continued to be the rule of assessment from that time to the present. So, as he had said, the term "valued rent" had acquired a technical meaning; the result being that only those proprietors whose estates were upon the stent roll were subject to the assessment for the purposes of education, although undoubtedly it was a tax intended to be imposed upon all, the principle being equal contributions for the common benefit. As it was, however, those only contributed whose estates happened to be upon the ancient roll for the land tax. The inequality of its operation was illustrated in every county and district. He had obtained some Returns for the purpose of enabling him to judge of the unequal operation of the assessments imposed according to this antiquated roll, and he would mention one or two instances which might be taken as fair specimens of the whole. In the county of Forfar were two estates, one of the real value of £670, and the other of the real value of £345, yet each paid the same amount of rate, the "valued rent" of each estate, according to the old valuation roll, being the same. In the county of Perth were three estates—the first of the rental of £490, the second having a rental of £734, and the third a rental of £800; yet all paid the same amount of rate, the "valued rent" of these estates, which are of so different values now, being originally the same. In the county of Dumfries, again, were two estates—respectively of the rental of £551 and £3,823, which paid within a fraction the same amount of rate, the valued rent of the two being the same. In the county of Aberdeen, one estate, with a rental of £455, paid the same rate substantially as another estate with a rental of £964. In the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright were three estates noted—of the respective rentals of £126, £239, and £405; but they are all rated at the same amount within a trifle, that which was rated highest being the estate of £126 a year. That seemed an altogether unjust, inequitable system, and the marvel must be that it should have been permitted to last so long. He had mentioned that by the Act of 1803 the number of the managing body had been reduced by a provision to the effect that only those heritors whose estates were valued at not less than £100 Scots should have a voice in the management of the schools. The operation of that provision was also very capricious. In the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright there was an instance where the proprietor of a real rental of £405 a year had no voice in the management, because his ancient valuation was under £100 Scots; while another proprietor, with a rental of £126, had a share in the management because his estate was valued at over £100 Scots. In Dumfries a proprietor with a rental of £563 had no share in the school management, while another with a rental of £350 had. As he had endeavoured to explain, while the rating or assessment for the support of parish schools was confined to those heritors whose estates were on the stent roll, they had a reasonable claim to have the management of the schools in their own hands. But if they were to have anything worthy of the name of a national system of education, it was impossible that this ancient rule of rating should be continued.

He would now proceed to state to the House the extent to which the parish schools—supported by the rates imposed upon “the valued rented” heritors, and which are managed by a select number of their own body, in conjunction with the parish ministers—contribute to the education of Scotland. In the whole country there are on the rolls of the schools 424,360 children. He had taken the numbers with respect to the country districts—that was to the whole country, excluding the 17 larger towns—from the Report of the Commissioners; but he had been under the necessity of making an estimate of the number attending in the towns, there being no precise statistics which enabled him to make a statement with perfect confidence. That number he estimated at 88,183, leaving a balance of 336,177 in the country schools. Speaking with accuracy from the statistical information given by the Commissioners there were on the roll of country schools 312,795 scholars. Now, there ought to be educational provision in Scotland for about 500,000 or rather more than 500,000 children. There were upon the rolls of all the schools taken together, 424,360, leaving a deficiency, according to the Report of the Commissioners upon Education, of children not on the roll of any school of 75,640. Now, it was necessary that provision should be made by law, if they were to have an efficient system of education at all, and nothing was to be left to chance or charity, for the education of all the children in Scotland. He did not mean to say that schools were to be provided for all that number of children; but that the State must take cognizance of the number requiring education, and must provide for those not already provided for. Of course, the existing parish schools, which had been reported upon by the Education Commissioners, must form part of any national system; but the question they had to consider was, whether they could, with any propriety, be dealt with separately, and maintained as distinct schools upon their present footing, or something resembling their present footing, the new schools being under a different system of maintenance and management, or whether it would not be more satisfactory, and more conducive to the end in view, to institute one efficient system of maintenance and management for all the schools which are to be denominated public, and of which the law was to take cognizance? For his own part, he had never seen any advantage likely to arise from the double system. It was therefore intended that there should be no distinction. The new schools and the old schools would be of the same character, and there could be no reason why they should be differently managed or maintained. That being so—if they were to have only one system for all the schools which were to be provided under the national system, and which must necessarily be much more numerous than those which existed at present, he had to consider further whether the system he had described as existing with reference to the existing parish schools was such that it could be adopted as the one system of management for all the schools to be provided. He owned that without difficulty or hesitation he had arrived at the conclusion that it would be impossible, and certainly impolitic, to impose the rates necessary for the support of the schools upon a certain class of heritors only, and according to a valuation so capricious as that which he had explained; nor could he see any good reason in support of the proposition that the management of the schools should be vested in a select number of the valued rent heritors. He had, therefore, to propose to the House—and the measure which he was now asking leave to introduce contained a provision to that effect—to extend the area of rating for the support of the public schools to all lands and heritages whatsoever, to abolish the valued rent as the rule of rating, and substitute for it the real rent—so that the proprietors and heritors, without exception, should contribute to promote the education of the country according to the actual value of their possessions. There was no reason now, nor had there been since 1854, for having recourse to the valuation roll, because in that year an Act was passed in which the actual valuation was made up of the whole of the lands and heritages in the country. The proposal, therefore, he had to submit on this subject of the area of rating was, that it should extend to all lands and heritages, and that the rule should be the real valuation—thus bringing the whole within the operation of the rate assessment. In that case there could be no longer any reason for confining the management to the heritors, or to a select number of their body. The real idea of the Scotch Legislature was to impose the rate on all, and to give the vote to all who paid the rate. How it came to be modified he had explained. He was now only recurring to the ancient principles of the law in giving a voice in the management to all who contributed to the rate. Of course, such a body would be far too numerous to be practicable as a managing body; but there was a way of reducing them, that was approved by modern experience, and that was to make the ratepayers electors, and enable them to elect a managing body; and accordingly the provisions of the Bill in respect to the managing body was, that the ratepayers in each parish or district should elect the school Board in the same manner, substantially as was provided for in the English Act. This applied not only to parishes in rural districts, but to all burghs. Indeed, the greatest destitution in the means of education, according to the Report of the Commissioners, was in the burghs. There was comparatively little destitution in the parishes, and none that called for any special remark in the Lowland parishes. There was greater destitution in country districts in the Highlands, and the greatest of all in the large towns. The Bill proposed that in every burgh there should be a school Board elected by the ratepayers—the rate again being assessed upon the occupiers of all lands and heritages, and the rule of assessment under the Poor Law being taken substantially as the assessment for that of the school-rate. With a view to save the expense of a double assessment and double collection the school rate would be added to the poor rate, assessed upon the same data and collected at the same time. The duties of the school Board would be to ascertain, each Board in its own parish or burgh, the educational requirements of the parish or burgh, the existing supply of education; and to determine whether any, and if so, what aid was necessary. Of course, the school Board was to supersede the existing managing bodies of public schools—they came in place of the managers and heritors in parishes and burghs. In their hands would rest the selection of the masters of the schools, and they would have the general charge of the educational requirements, and the provisions to be made for them in the various districts. In the Bill that was laid before the Parliament and indeed passed this House, in 1869—in that Bill, after it came down from the House of Lords, provision was made for a temporary Board in Edinburgh, with a view to set the machine in motion. It was not proposed by that Bill that the Parliamentary grant should be handed over to the Board in Edinburgh, or should be administered otherwise than hitherto by a Department of the Government directly and immediately responsible to Parliament. The share of the Parliamentary grant which Scotland now received was £80,000 a year. Under the present measure, if it became law, that grant would be largely increased—indeed by several-fold. He would not indulge in any expectation that the administration of so large a sum would be handed over to any permanent Board to be constituted in Scotland, or removed from the Department of the Government hitherto entrusted with that duty, and immediately and directly responsible to Parliament for it; but it was undoubtedly well worthy consideration, whether the example set by the provision of the Bill of 1869, to establish a Board in Scotland for the period of three years, in order to set the new system going, and determine where new schools were wanted, and the particular situation in which they ought to be established, ought not to be followed. He confessed he was not himself partial to a temporary Board. He should have the greatest possible difficulty in agreeing to it—a difficulty which was strongly felt in 1869, in proposing a satisfactory constitution for such a Board; and it was to be considered whether it was really necessary to the attainment of the end in view, or whether a Department to be constituted with a view to education in Scotland would not be able to exercise efficient supervision and control over the local school Boards, so as to see that, on the one hand, they did not neglect their duties, or, on the other, that they did not exceed them. By the provisions of the Bill, the duty of determining, in the first instance, whether any, and what additional provision was required, and how it ought to be supplied, was laid upon the school Boards. Now, surely, all that remained to be done, in addition to that, by any sensible body was to see that they were attentive, and not negligent or perfunctory in the performance of their duties; and that they were not extravagant nor yet over-parsimonious.

Now, the proposal which he had to submit to the House was, that Her Majesty should appoint a Committee of the Privy Council for Education in Scotland, and that that Committee, which in the Bill was denominated the Scotch Education Department, should have, as a Government Department necessarily must have, the administration of the Parliamentary Grant; and that they should also exercise that supervision and control over the local Boards to which I have referred as necessary. Provision was accordingly made for the discharge of those duties by the Department, which would be found defined in the interpretation clause. These were the main provisions of the Bill which he now laid on the Table. He abstained from entering into the details, which would be more satisfactorily communicated by the circulation of the Bill itself. The idea on which the measure was based was, as the House would perceive, this—We take the existing provisions of the law of Scotland on the subject of education in the parish schools and burgh schools as the foundation. The burgh schools had no aid from rates at present, and where they were insufficient to meet the educational requirements of the burgh in which they existed, there was no legal provision for extending their parochial system into burghs. The consequence was strikingly manifested in the case of Glasgow. There, there were 291 schools altogether, a very large proportion of them being indifferent, and a considerable proportion of them altogether bad; but of the 291, only one of them is a public school—the Burgh School of Glasgow. Therefore the parochial system had, in reality, to be extended, as it had not hitherto been, to the burghs. In so far as public schools were to be multiplied in rural parishes, the Bill made provision for that being done; and further for extending the system into burghs, but under the management of the school Board of each burgh. That had been done, not with the view of reducing the standard of the present burgh schools, which was generally above that of the elementary schools, but with the view of increasing the standard of the only public schools in Scotland providing for the secondary education of the people. The area of the rating being extended, the managing body was accordingly extended, but reduced to a convenient number in the manner provided by modern experience—namely, the electoral system.

He had omitted to state directly and distinctly—though it might have been implied—that any remaining connection between the public schools and the Church of Scotland was now entirely severed. Indeed, the only connection subsisting between them since 1861 was the presence of the parish minister on the board of management. He believed Presbyteries claimed the right of periodical visitation and examination; but the Royal Commissioners had reported that, in their opinion, their visitation was of no practical benefit to the schools. It was impossible that these schools could now have any communication with any particular Church, and accordingly the Bill provided that they should have no communication with any denomination whatsoever. He had said nothing on the subject of the religious difficulty—perhaps it had not been pressing so much on his mind, because, so far as he had been able to ascertain—and he had been at some pains in making inquiries in all directions on this subject—the religious difficulty had not, and never had, any practical existence in Scotland. There had never obtained, by any provision of law, a conscience clause in any public schools; nevertheless, they had always been conducted as if a very precise conscience clause had been in operation. He believed it to be a fact that in every parish school in Scotland—and he thought he might extend the statement to all Church schools (with the exception of the Episcopal and Roman Catholic)—in the Free Church, the United Presbyterian Church, and the Independent, the conscience clause was practically operative—that was to say, religion was taught in a certain specified part of the day, when those children whose parents desired them to attend might be instructed; but the secular teaching was so consecutive that the teaching of religion was no interruption to the education of any of the pupils. The fact was, that among the various denominations of Presbyterians there was really no preference on the part of the parents for any one school rather than another, because it happened to belong to a particular denomination. That statement was fully borne out by the Report of the Commissioners with respect to the whole country, with the exception of three districts, which they stated were in a worse condition, so far as education was concerned, than any other part of Scotland. The children belonging to the Established Church attended in great numbers the free schools and vice versa: and he had had deputations of masters of parish schools and Free Church schools, who all concurred in saying that no religious difficulty was ever experienced.

He had further to state that provision was made in the Bill whereby the school Board of any parish or burgh might take over any existing school—that was to say, if they were satisfied that education would be promoted by taking over the particular school buildings, masters, and scholars, and placing it under their management; and then they would become public schools in all respects under the management of the Board, maintained and dealt with by them in precisely the same manner as the parish schools. The Grants, it was further provided, much in the terms of the Bill of 1869, might be given to all the existing schools conforming to the regulations under which alone a Grant was to be given; but there was a provision with respect to future schools of a denominational character—that a Grant should not be given unless, in the opinion of the Scotch Education Department, there were exceptional reasons for arriving at the conclusion that such a school was necessary in the particular locality in which it happened to be called into existence. He need hardly state that all schools under the operation of the Bill would be subjected to undenominational inspection. It was only necessary to refer quite generally to the Report of the Commissioners in order to determine the value of inspection. The percentage of good schools, as compared with the percentage of indifferent and bad schools, was very large; and nothing had surprised him more than to find the small extent to which at present advantage was taken of inspection. At present the inspection was denominational, and that led to wonderful anomalies and expenses—there were Church Inspectors, Free Church Inspectors, and Roman Catholic Inspectors, all travelling together to examine three or four schools in the same locality. Even with that denominational inspection, out of 1,133 parish, side, and Parliamentary schools in Scotland, only 337 submitted to inspection. The Commissioners stated that they were unable to account for that otherwise than by what they had been told, that many clergymen in the Church of Scotland had so great an aversion to Government inspection, or interference of any kind, that they were willing to sacrifice the Government Grant rather than submit to it. The provision contained in the Bill on this subject was similar to that contained in the English Bill. These were the principal provisions of the Bill which he asked the leave of the House to lay upon the Table. He did not flatter himself for one moment that the Bill would not be sharply criticized. He was not even sanguine that he had succeeded in realizing his own conception. That conception was large, for it proposed no less than this—to present to this House a comprehensive and efficient scheme of national education, thoroughly national and entirely undenominational; such a scheme as, according to the best of his belief and judgment, the country for which it was designed was prepared to accept, and which he hoped Parliament would sanction.

MR. GORDON said, it could not be expected that the proposals of the Bill could be discussed at any length on this occasion. He should therefore content himself with observing that the measure, as described by the Lord Advocate, contained some proposals which were certainly new, and had not been contained in any of the former Bills; and which were at variance with the unanimous recommendations of the Commissioners—men of all parties and all Churches—who were appointed to inquire into the subject of Scotch education. At the same time, he would refrain from expressing strong opinions on the subject until he had read the Bill. So far as regarded the schools he should be most happy to assist in any way for the purpose of securing a better remuneration to the teachers engaged in education; but he did not exactly understand from what source the funds were to come, and it would give him great pleasure to do anything to effect an improvement in the condition of the burgh schools. With regard to the parochial schools, it was now proposed that they should be entirely “disestablished”—disconnected from the Established Church. That was a proposition which certainly had not received the concurrence of any of the Commissioners, with the exception of one, and he qualified his opinion. What the Commissioners suggested was, that the parochial schools should be continued upon their present footing. Now he (Mr. Gordon) would go further, and would have the management extended, if the Government chose so to term it, liberalized. His feeling was strongly against destroying those schools, which had done admirable service to the cause of education in Scotland, and which had been the object of envy and admiration amongst all nations; and he regretted exceedingly that it should be thought necessary, with a view to carry through what was called a national system of education, to abolish those schools, and place them entirely in the position of the new schools. Those schools had been successful, and the schoolmasters were exceedingly anxious that they should be preserved, if it were only as standards up to which the new schools should attempt to raise themselves. He must say that he considered that this subject was well deserving of reflection and consideration so as to determine the propriety of discontinuing them, after having rendered so much useful service to the cause of education. There was another proposition contained in the Bill completely at variance with the views of the Commissioners, as well as with the Bill of 1869. It was a point which would excite a good deal of attention in Scotland.

Mr. Gordon

There was to be no School Board for the management of schools there. Now, if there was one question more than another as to which the people of Scotland were jealous, it was that their schools should be under the management of a Scotch Board, and not under the management of the Privy Council. The Privy Council was, no doubt, entitled to great consideration; but there was a material difference in the system of education which was proposed for Scotland and that which was now about to be given for the first time to England. The parish schools in Scotland had hitherto combined both the position of elementary and secondary schools, and had been of the greatest service as affording a means of enlightened and liberal education to those who evinced abilities which rendered such education useful; and he could give no better illustration of this than by stating that something like 60 per cent of the students who present themselves at the Universities of Scotland had been educated at the parish schools. Those schools, therefore, fulfilled a purpose in Scotland which was not expected of the elementary schools in England. It was therefore most desirable that they should not be linked to the Privy Council, which had to deal with the elementary education of England, and which had not hitherto been called upon to deal with such a system as that to be proposed for Scotland. This, he thought, was a matter with regard to which there was a very strong feeling in Scotland. It was possible that some provisions might be framed which would tend to soften the proposal made by his right hon. Friend; but until he had seen the Bill he could not speak as to that. When it was said they should not have an Education Board in Scotland, had not Ireland its Board of Education? Why, then, should not Scotland have one also, for the purpose of managing a system entirely different in its principle from that which existed in England? The Lord Advocate was quite right in stating that the religious difficulty did not exist in Scotland. But why? Because, while the Church had the management of the schools in that country they conducted them on the most liberal terms; they instituted a conscience clause, and gave instructions to the schoolmasters that any child objecting to receive the religious teaching imparted in the parish schools should at once be relieved from attendance; and they had evidence from the Roman Catholic priests and others that they were so satisfied that no attempt was made at proselytism that they freely permitted the children of their creed to attend the parish schools. It was therefore quite right that it should be understood there was no religious difficulty. But then he had not found that the Lord Advocate in his statement admitted any recognition of religion. It was proposed practically to abolish the parish schools. In those schools there had been a "use and wont" of religious instruction as contained in the Shorter Catechism and the Bible; and that had not been objected to by any person, as his right hon. Friend had stated. They were going to create new schools without giving any recognition to the subject of religion. As far as teaching the Bible itself in the schools went, he knew there was a strong feeling in Scotland in its favour; and when they were legislating on the subject of education, were they prepared to ignore the general feeling on that subject? If the Catechism were abolished in the schools, let not the Bible be excluded from them. Let them not be deterred from recognizing the Bible by any idea that they were establishing religion by doing so. He should regret if they could not find a concurrence of opinion among different religious denominations that the Bible should be taught in the schools. The difficulty was not to be got rid of by sending it to the Parochial Board to be decided, because the Parochial Board was just as much the State power as that House itself. If the parish schools were to be abolished, where an admirable system of religious teaching had been carried on without the least injury to the consciences of those attending them, it was most important that the people of Scotland should consider whether in the new system that was to be introduced they did not wish that there should be some recognition of religion. He was not arguing for sectarian or denominational education in Scotland, but only for the great principle that the Bible should be taught in the schools, and he was surprised to find that no reference had been made to so important a matter. In conclusion, he trusted that when he saw the Bill there might be in it some provision that would obviate some of the objections he had indicated, and it would be his endeavour to do everything in his power to expedite the passing of a measure to settle the question of education in Scotland.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said: I do not like to pass over the introduction of such a large and obviously carefully-considered measure for reforming our system of national education in Scotland without some general expression of appreciation. But I have a lively remembrance of the chorus of applause which greeted the Vice President of the Council when he introduced his English Bill last year, and the opposition which it afterwards excited from the very men who had applauded it at the outset. I would, therefore, speak with full reserve as to the conclusions which may arise in my mind on a deliberate consideration of the provisions of the Bill; for my right hon. Friend has kept his counsel so well that I do not think any independent Scotch Members had the slightest idea what was to be the nature of his Bill until he spoke to-night. But I can have no hesitation in saying that I think he has grappled with the difficulties of the subject boldly and with knowledge. In one respect the Bill differs from its numerous predecessors, in dealing with burgh schools as well as with primary schools, and, in this respect, I can have no hesitation in expressing a warm approval. It is difficult for Englishmen to grasp the difference between the Scotch and English system of schools; for, until last year, there was no true national system of education in England, while Scotland has enjoyed that blessing for several centuries. Our religious reformers extended the system which existed in practice at their time, and recommended a chain of schools, beginning with the primary, passing through secondary grammar schools, then through preparatory colleges professing the usual trivium of the dead languages, logic, and natural philosophy, until finally the platform of the national Universities should be reached. The scheme was only partially carried out, the colleges never having been organized; but these secondary or burgh schools exist in every Royal, municipal, and Parliamentary burgh in Scotland, with the exception of three small ones. Most of these—indeed, all but two—have lower primary schools attached to their secondary schools.

These burgh schools furnish 42 per cent of the students of the Universities, while the parochial primary schools, which still give secondary education in a less organized way than the burgh schools, yield the chief part of the remaining 58 per cent of students. Primary and secondary education are thus so thoroughly ingrained in Scotland that you cannot deal with them separately, nor would Scotchmen give one farthing for a system of national education in which they were separated. The great Napoleon used to say that every soldier carried his Marshal's baton in his knapsack; so every Scotch peasant, when he goes to school, carries in his satchel a minister's gown, or other emblem of a learned profession, and it is his own fault if he lose it. I congratulate the Lord Advocate on having maintained this inherent difference between the education of the Scotch and English people by having, for the first time, provided for it in one measure. I have a little regret that he has taken those schools from the management of the town councils, who have done their duty well by them. This course was, perhaps, unavoidable. Certainly, in a money point of view, they contribute only slightly to their maintenance, for of the £50,000 which these schools cost annually, £42,000 are derived from fees, and £3,000 from endowments. Whether he has done wisely in not having a National Board of Education to preserve these peculiarities is a serious question, and one upon which I desire entirely to reserve my opinion, not only till I study the Bill, but also till I see the Revised Code from the Education Department. I think the Bill is wise in retaining as a burden on the land the present amount of between £40,000 and £50,000 expended on the parochial schools. But, in doing so, it was right to render their management more popular. The educational management of these schools was, in reality, a popular one, vested in all heritors till 1803, when it was unwisely restricted to large landowners. No scheme could be satisfactory that did not restore their popular character, and open up the management of these schools to all who are interested in their maintenance. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) is wrong in saying that the Lord Advocate proposes to abolish parochial schools. On the contrary, as I understand him, he only proposes to develop and extend them by the aid of a larger area of taxation. With regard to the plan for creating new schools, and adopting the existing denominational ones, it is unnecessary at present to express an opinion. The question which has wrecked all previous Scotch Education Bills in Parliament has not been the religious, but the ecclesiastical difficulty. There is positively no religious difficulty worth speaking of in Scotland. When you have a whole nation, with few exceptions, worshipping in a common faith, and even in a common ceremonial—separated into sections not by questions of doctrine, but only of Church polity—surely, it will be a scandal to my country if this Bill be again wrecked on shoals of ecclesiastical jealousies. In the progress of this Bill, there will be no discussions, such as those of last year, upon conscience clauses. These have been long in operation by custom, most efficiently preserved in all schools in Scotland, and there will be no objection to give them a legislative sanction. The real fight will be as to how far the different Churches are to superintend the common religious instruction of the schools. One Church, indeed—the United Presbyterian, supposed to contain about a fifth of the people of Scotland—are of opinion that religion should not be superintended or paid for by the State in any way, and, in fact, desire that it should be relegated to the parent and the minister; but this is by no means the general opinion of the Scotch Churches, which would desire to see religion an integral part of school education, under effective inspection and supervision, if not by the State, by the authorities of the Church. Yet if, with a common religious faith, the Churches cannot come to some agreement as to how they can mutually assist each other and the school Board in the religious upbringing of the youth of Scotland, then this House and the country will, no doubt, think that the Churches value more their slight ecclesiastical differences than the religious and social welfare of the people committed to their charge. A truly national system of education ought to be much more easily attainable in Scotland than in any other part of the United Kingdom; and, if it were not for our past unhappy experience, everyone would congratulate my right hon. Friend in his honest endeavours to settle this question. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Glasgow complains that the Lord Advocate ignores religious instruction in the schools. I apprehend that he entirely mistakes the tenour of his observations. What I understood was that he relies on the spirit of the Scotch people, as represented by the school Boards, and he knows, as we all know, that the wish of the people is that there should be religious education in the school. He did not mention a single religious inability, such as we find in the English measure, and thinks we may safely leave this question to the people of Scotland. For myself, as a lover of education, I can promise to give a careful and impartial consideration to his measure, in the hope of being able to give to it a general support.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU wished to be informed whether there was any limitation on the election of the school Boards, or any qualification of the electors required? As the right hon. and learned Gentleman was doubtless aware, the masters of the parish schools in Scotland were in many cases Masters of Arts—men who had taken their degree, and who occupied a high social position, and it would not be right that they should be overruled by school Boards composed of members of less learning and an inferior social position to themselves. He should, therefore, be glad to know what provision had been made respecting the qualification of the electors. He further wished to know whether the school Boards, which, as had already been pointed out, would be elected chiefly by Presbyterians, were to have the power of forcing the children of Episcopalians and of Roman Catholics to attend religious instruction to which their parents might object; and whether schools which professed the doctrines of the latter denomination would still receive some support from the State? He asked these questions not only for his own information, but also for that of the country, in order to prevent the intention of the measure from being misunderstood.

MR. ANDERSON said, he should reserve the remarks he would otherwise have made upon the able statement of the Lord Advocate until he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the details of the measure through the medium of the Bill itself. He could not, however, refrain from saying that there were one or two points in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's scheme which he (Mr. Anderson) was afraid would give considerable dissatisfaction. One of them was the relegation of the control of the local school Boards to a department of the Privy Council in London. He was sure that that proposal would be received with the greatest disfavour in Scotland; and, unless it was found when they came to look at the Bill that the proposition would be more advantageous to Scotland than had appeared from the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he did not think that it would be approved of. With regard to the question of compulsion, he had hoped that the Lord Advocate would have moved a little further. He (Mr. Anderson) was quite convinced that they were ripe for a more complete measure in that direction than had been obtained in the English compulsory clause. Had the Lord Advocate proposed to go beyond that he (Mr. Anderson) believed he would have carried it, and the people of Scotland would have been grateful for the boon. As regarded the religious difficulty, he would only say that, while he quite agreed with previous speakers that it had hitherto not been a great practical difficulty in the schools themselves, there was undoubtedly in the country a very strong party who would demand that catechisms and formularies should be excluded from all rate-aided schools. That being the case, he did not see how it would be possible to exclude from the Bill all notice of the religious question.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he rose only to make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government to press the further stages of the Bill at an early date, so that its provisions could be fairly and fully discussed. It was chiefly owing to the fact that it had been brought in at so late a period of the Session that the measure on the same subject which had been introduced two Sessions ago by the predecessor in Office of the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been lost. He thought the jealousy likely to arise from the control of the school Boards being placed in the Privy Council in London would vanish when the large and liberal scope of the measure came to be properly understood. Upon the question of the religious difficulty he thought good counsel must be taken in order to avoid the numerous pitfalls that beset all attempts to deal with the question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to have forgotten that the Roman Catholics formed a large proportion of the population in some districts in Scotland, and were opposed to the religious principles held by the great body of the community. His predecessor had been prepared to allow separate Grants to their schools; but his right hon. and learned Friend had not stated whether he proposed by his Bill to allow similar Grants.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he was prepared to allow Grants to such schools.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that in that case many of the difficulties in carrying out the Bill would be removed. He foresaw that the question of giving such large powers to local Boards would be regarded with great jealousy; but, at the same time, he felt bound to offer his congratulations to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the ability with which he had introduced the measure, and pledged himself to give it a general support.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he desired to draw attention to the question of the dismissal and superannuation of schoolmasters.

SIR JOHN HAY observed that any person acquainted with Scotland must know how much the working classes in the rural parishes desired to see their clergymen have a voice in the education of their children. As it was, however, possible that in some cases the clergymen might be excluded by the popular vote, he should be glad to see some provision by which the clergymen connected ex officio with parish schools should have a seat at the school Board.

MR. MACFIE joined in thanking the Government, and in particular the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, for bringing in this Bill, and doing it thus early in the Session. He was sure that the proposition for a Scotch Committee of Privy Council would excite in Scotland a feeling almost of indignation. The Scotch liked Boards—Boards constituted of numerous members and meeting in presence of reporters—not Committees, that were not really Committees, nor did not act as such, but were in fact the Chairman. He would like to know who the Chairman of this proposed Committee was to be? Was he to be a Scotchman? Were the Committee to be Scotchmen? If so, they would no doubt work, and not let themselves be ignored by their Chairman. But there should be a Board—one meeting in Edinburgh. It was cruel to bring all the way up to London parties who might have business to do with the Committee or Board. He was in favour of undenominational unsectarian education. All the more did he set a high value on the character of the teachers. They should be men of piety and religious character. He hoped some means would be adopted—some provisions be contained in the Bill—to ensure that the religious character which hitherto Scotch schoolmasters had borne would be maintained. He also trusted some means would be presented for maintaining their connection with the Universities. The tendency of such teachers was to raise the standard at which their scholars aimed, and to which they would be brought. The recognition and extension of burgh schools was an excellent feature of the Bill. Such schools, brought under a Scotch Board, would become patterns which English educationists would imitate. On that account, also, he pleaded for the management of the Scotch schools being left to be carried out in Scotland according to Scotch ways.

MR. DIXON desired to enter his emphatic protest against what he could not help conceiving was a breach of that principle which ought, on all occasions, to be supported by the present Government—a principle, however, which was violated in the Education Bill of 1870, which was now to be violated in the Bill brought forward for Scotland, and, in all probability, would be violated in the consideration of the measure which should be applied to Ireland—by the especial favour shewn to the Roman Catholics. He thought that the measure as at present framed would give great dissatisfaction throughout the country.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply to the questions of the noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu), said, that the only qualifications required for the school Board was that the persons elected and the electors should be ratepayers. The noble Lord had asked, secondly, whether, under the provisions of the Bill, any child could be compelled to attend religious instruction, though such religious instruction were distasteful to its parents or its guardians. The answer was, that the provisions on that subject were in accordance with those of the English Bill; and under these provisions no child whatever could be compelled to attend religious teaching against the wishes of its parents or guardians. There was a provision in this Bill, as in the English Bill, that parents might select the school at which to place their children. The noble Lord had also assumed that, hereafter, under that portion of the Bill, no school would be allowed to participate in the Grant if it did not put itself under the school Board. That, however, was not so. He also desired to inform the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) that there was no exceptional treatment accorded to the Roman Catholics. It was, perhaps, unnecessary for him to say anything on the subject, but he wished to assure hon. Members that nothing that had fallen from him would warrant the impression that it was intended to destroy the efficacy of parish schools.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend and extend the provisions of the Law of Scotland on the subject of Education, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. Secretary BRUCE, and Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 17.]

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in rising to move "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Vaccination Act (1867), and to report whether such Act should be amended," said, that he made this Motion in compliance with the statement made by the Home Secretary towards the end of last Session, when a Bill was brought in by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), to relax the stringent punishments inflicted by the refusal to permit vaccination. The feeling of the House on this subject was such that there was little chance that his hon. Friend would be able to carry his Bill; but it was also felt that it was desirable to remove, if possible, the objections which existed in the minds of some persons against vaccination. He did not imagine that the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) more than any other Member of the House had the slightest doubt of the utility and necessity of vaccination, and that it was necessary not only to encourage it, but to make it compulsory. Opposition to such views were not heard in that House; but it was to be found, he was sorry to say, among certain persons in this country who had indeed carried their resistance to an extent that had been injurious to health and destructive to life. They must have forgotten the state of the country and the civilized community before vaccination was introduced. During thirty years before the introduction of vaccination there were on an average 3,000 deaths from small-pox per annum in every million of the population, while between 1854 and 1865 they were reduced to an average of 202 per million. In Berlin the statistics were still more conclusive—owing, probably, to the great care taken in Prussian administration—for in that city the decrease was from 3,422 to 176. Again, in the Smallpox Hospital, where all the nurses and the servants were invariably re-vaccinated on their appointment, the resident surgeon had not a single case on record during the last 34 years. He only mentioned these cases to show that the Government had not the slightest doubt not merely of the advantages and efficacy of vaccination, but of the necessity of having a law to enforce it. It would, no doubt, be pleasanter not to be compelled to have recourse to law to have it performed; but, unfortunately, they had to contend with opposition—the opposition of ignorance, and also, he was sorry to say, with the opposition arising from interested motives preying upon this ignorance; and, lastly, with the great neglect which arose purely from apathy. It was owing to those causes that a compulsory law was necessary, and statistics showed that the destructiveness of the disease increased or decreased accordingly as compulsion had or had not been enforced. In Scotland and Ireland, where they had been able to secure complete compulsion, the disease which at one time had been very prevalent, had been reduced to a minimum and was, indeed, hardly known; in those districts of England where, before vaccination was introduced, it had been fearfully destructive, it had now been greatly diminished; whilst, on the other hand, in those districts where the guardians had not enforced it, they were liable to frequent outbreaks. With these facts before them, it might be asked where was the necessity for a Committee? But he (Mr. Forster) was strongly of opinion that good results would follow from their labours. There were some persons in the country who entertained in their own minds a conscientious objection to vaccination, from a belief that it did their children harm; but he thought the evidence that would be brought before the Committee would tend to convince them of their error. At all events it was due to the feelings of those parents who objected to vaccination that further inquiry should be instituted, and he trusted the result would be that martyrs to the prejudice against vaccination would no longer be found. Another reason for the appointment of the Committee was that it was desirable to carry public opinion with the action of the law, and there were some cases in which the guardians wished to be strengthened in doing what appeared to many to be an arbitrary act. The Committee must take into consideration many suggestions which had been made in various parts of the country for rendering the Act more effectual than it was at present. The administration of the Act should likewise be inquired into; and he believed that when that was done it would be found that both the Privy Council and the Poor Law Board had done their utmost to prevent imperfect vaccination. It was their wish in no way to limit the scope of the inquiry, and he therefore proposed that the Committee should be empowered to take evidence with regard to the operation of the Act within Ireland and Scotland. He trusted that the inquiry would not only be full and complete, but that, in the interest of the public, they would feel it to be their duty to make their Report speedily, as it was desirable that there should be as little delay in the matter as possible.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY observed that the arguments urged by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) in proof of the efficacy of the existing law in regard to vaccination had cut the ground from under his feet in asking for inquiry, for there could be no use in inquiring into a matter which was so well ascertained. Inquiry was good where there was anything to inquire about, but not where there was sound ground for action, and action was urgent. In such a case an inquiry was not only useless, it was positively mischievous; for nothing could be more dangerous than to profess a doubtfulness concerning a matter about which there was no doubt and which demanded only decision. The right hon. Gentleman, with a view to induce the House to acquiesce in the inquiry, had told them that there was ample evidence to show that where the law had been carried out small-pox had disappeared, and that nothing was wanted in England but strictly enforcing the law to secure similar immunity. And yet at the moment when the right hon. Gentleman brought forward this Motion for idle inquiry about vaccination, as a speculative remedy, the small-pox was raging in London. Instead of proposing an inquiry, those who believed that the law was right ought rather to express, and in action evince, their confidence in the results which it effected. He objected to the appointment of this Committee, moreover, because the subject had come within the scope of the inquiry entrusted to the Royal Sanitary Commission. That Commission had just taken evidence on the subject, expressed their opinion on it, and their Report would in a few days be in the hands of Members. Their opinion was that the law was complete, and required nothing but enforcing. They proposed better registration to insure its enforcement. It had been very imperfectly carried out in England; but in Ireland and Scotland it had been properly enforced, and with such complete success as to have nearly stamped out the small-pox. What was now really required was to empower the authorities to stimulate the responsible officers to enforce the existing Vaccination Acts. He thought that the reference of the question to a Select Committee was a most mischievous mode of shirking the responsibility of enforcing the law as it stands, and especially mischievous when the public had professed confidence in the mode already provided for meeting the present danger. The fact was that the Bill of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) at the close of last Session became—as so many Bills were still pressing at that period of the year—an embarrassment, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite in an unguarded moment had promised the hon. Member that if he would withdraw the Bill, though there was no chance of its passing, but only of its choking the way of others, there should be an inquiry. It was an innocent and perhaps defensible weakness at the moment; but he trusted that at the commencement of a Session so full of business the result of cooler and calmer reflection would be not to appoint such a Committee. If its appointment involved nothing more than the waste of the time of 15 hon. Gentlemen upstairs, he, for one, would offer no objection; but he believed that at a moment when an epidemic was raging in London, even the appearance of doubt, where confidence was what was chiefly necessary, would be so mischievous that, though he would not divide them on this question—the House having been taken by surprise, he should certainly do so on the nomination of the Committee.

MR. CANDLISH said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir Charles Adderley) argued against the Motion of his right hon. Friend on the ground that the existing law was satisfactory if it were only carried out. But that was exactly the weak point of the matter. The law was not now practically compulsory, and could not be carried out, and — arguing, therefore, the question from the right hon. Gentleman's own point of view—the law imposed penalty after penalty if vaccination were not performed. If a parent did not get his child vaccinated he might be summoned before a magistrate and fined 20s.; but the right hon. Gentleman knew very well that did not secure compliance with the law. There were cases in which the penalty had been repeated at least half-a-dozen times, and the child remained unvaccinated to the present day. Surely, then, the right hon. Gentleman, if he believed in the efficacy of vaccination, must be dissatisfied with the law. [SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: With its administrators.] Well, then, would the right hon. Gentleman say how the administrators had the means of carrying out the law? The administrators had not the power to take the child out of the arms of the mother, and carry it directly to the operator, and until that power was given them the penalty was merely the legal price paid for the disregard of vaccination. The law as it stood was ineffective, and, notwithstanding, it was harsh and cruel upon some parents:

let them try if it could not be improved. He believed that it could be made more tolerant in its operation, and, at the same time, more efficiently and successfully applied. If this Committee were not granted an amount of discontent would be generated in the country the consequences of which could not at present be foreseen. There was not a constituency in England in which there were not to be found a small number of intelligent and conscientious men who would be deeply grieved if the House should not grant this inquiry. The Committee of 1867 had for its object not to inquire into the effects of vaccination, but to deal with the clauses of a specific Bill. The question on its merits had never been referred to a Committee, and hence the weakness of the law at the present moment. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would forego his promised opposition.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he joined in expressing the hope that his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) would allow the Committee to be appointed. There was no matter that required more consideration than the operation of the vaccination laws in England. We had evidence that in Ireland they had been perfectly successful; but in various parts of London, which was now visited by a fearful scourge, the differences in the administration of the law were very great. In some parishes it had been carried out very successfully, while in others no vaccination inspectors had been appointed, and scarcely anything had been done to insure obedience to the law. He held in his hand a letter from the medical officer of the Hampstead Hospital stating that so far as he could judge in the metropolis there could be no doubt the disease was increasing both in extent and in the malignity of its effects. However that might be, there could be no doubt that a very large number of persons were suffering from small-pox who, if the law had been properly administered, ought not to be suffering from it at all. There was no doubt that small-pox was a disease which could be stamped out if proper means were used; but now, on account of the inefficiency of our laws and the inadequacy of their administration, we had to submit to a fearful scourge, and in a great panic make haste to found hospitals, spending thousands of pounds when hundreds would have sufficed in the first instance. It was in the hope that the appointment of the Committee would bring home responsibility to some one that he desired to see the Motion carried. In proof of the way in which vaccination was neglected, he would refer to a report by one of the Officers of Health in London. That report stated that, in a particular district, during 1869-70 there were 1,105 births registered, and that the successful vaccinations had been only 253. There was no officer appointed to carry out the Act in that district. During the ten years from 1856 to 1867 the births annually registered were, on an average, 1,287, and the successful vaccinations 962, or three-fourths of the whole births; but they fell in 1868 to 685, in 1869 to 445, and in 1870 to 253: so that the Act in a large part of London had been entirely neglected. The six months allowed to the registrar to prepare a list of persons whose births had been registered but whose certificates of vaccination had not been received by him was too long, considering the migratory habits of many of the people. He had been told on very high authority that a very large proportion of the population moved from parish to parish and district to district every three months, so that if the Act were attempted to be carried out by the proper authorities the people could not be found, and in this way it was calculated one-fourth of the children registered were removed with their parents before the registrar's list was completed, and so escaped the operation of the Act. In one parish he was aware that the officer appointed used to go to the registrar and obtain a list at an earlier date, in order that he might follow up the people, and the consequence was that he had succeeded in getting four-fifths of the children vaccinated without a single prosecution. It was said by those who took an interest in the matter that all that was wanted was direct responsibility and proper organization. But the tendency of legislation of late years had been to divide responsibility, so that no one could say, when mischief arose, to whom the blame ought to be brought home.

DR. BREWER said, the question was whether a Committee ought to be appointed to inquire into the Vaccination Act. The reason why he thought such an inquiry as that which was now proposed would be useful was not because that House or the intelligent people of the country doubted the efficacy of vaccination when properly performed, but because in various classes, especially in large towns, not only was there doubt whether it was effectual as a preventive, but there was an exceedingly great fear that diseases even more to be dreaded than small-pox itself were conveyed by vaccine matter. It would be quite unwise of the House to ignore that opinion. He found it to prevail among the classes lately admitted to the small-pox hospitals, nor were these always the most ignorant, idle, or indigent of the population. Domestic servants, barmaids, men in similar employment, cabmen, 'busmen, and coachmen, gained admission to these hospitals, and were found unprotected by vaccination; and there were of every grade those who believed that vaccination was not simply no sure protection against small-pox, but the means of introducing serious diseases among the people. He was convinced that, if proper evidence was forthcoming, this fear would be dissipated, and therefore he believed that the House would do wisely and kindly by consenting to the appointment of this Committee. All that was necessary to improve the administration of vaccination, and to carry it more completely into the houses of poorer classes, was to instruct the poorer classes by such literature as would demonstrate to them the folly of the opposition which had been raised up in the large centres of population in this country against vaccination. He hoped there would be no opposition to the nomination of this Committee.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that as in 1867 the House had enabled him to pass the Compulsory Vaccination Bill, he might be allowed to say a few words on the subject. He thought the necessity of an inquiry had been proved by the debate. His right hon. Friend who opposed the Motion (Sir Charles Adderley) said that by granting a Committee of Inquiry the House would cast doubt upon a matter on which there was no doubt, and that the law of 1867 was complete; but the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) said the law was not complete, because it was not compulsory. He hoped that inquiry would remove this difference of opinion. He thought his right hon. Friend could hardly have read the Motion:—it was for the appointment of a Committee to consider the operation of the Act of 1867, and to inquire whether it required improvement. That was a fair subject for inquiry. He had brought in the Act himself, and he admitted that it was not perfect. He would presently show where the imperfection lay. The fact that this subject had been already considered by a Commission was not a good argument against further inquiry. As much opposition to vaccination existed out-of-doors, it was advisable to inquire whether the law was efficient, and if it was not, then they could consider how it might be improved. The opposition in this country to vaccination had been promoted by persons who inundated the country with writings in which they said that vaccination was the cause of various diseases, and that it was not efficient to prevent small-pox; therefore it was good for the country that a Committee should be appointed in order that there might be an opportunity of inquiring into the truth of the allegations that had been made. He admitted that there was a fault in the law—a fault which he could not avoid when he had charge of the Bill. In Scotland and Ireland the compulsory Acts had been perfectly successful. In Scotland, before 1863, the average number of deaths by small-pox was 2,000; in two years after the passing of the Act the number was reduced to 123. Why, then, was the English Act not so successful? Where was the defect? He believed the reason why it was not successful in England was because registration of births was not compulsory. In Scotland, the registration of births was compulsory; there was, therefore, one list of the children that were born, and another list of the children that had been vaccinated, and, by comparing the two lists, any case of omission to vaccinate could at once be seen. But in England there was not a compulsory registration of births; the law went so far as to impose a fine on the registration of a birth within a certain period, which fine was escaped if the birth was not registered at all. In the case of typhus fever or scarlatina, we could make an epidemic less virulent; but vaccination was a certain specific against small-pox. He believed that, in every case, vaccination prevented small-pox. It was therefore most necessary to take every means to make the law most efficient.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, the reason why he opposed inquiry last year was because he was afraid of doing anything to shake the confidence of the country in vaccination at a time when he knew a great epidemic was rolling over to this country from the Continent. In London, we were now in the midst of that wave, and it was there felt with the greatest severity; but it had not yet reached its summit, and he thought it had become very important to inquire why vaccination had not been so successful in England as in the two other parts of the United Kingdom. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Ad-derley) would withdraw his opposition to the Motion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER also appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw his opposition. As he had before said, the Government did not propose this Committee with the slightest doubt about the principle of vaccination, or the necessity of compulsory vaccination—and he need not say they had no intention of relaxing the operations of the law during the deliberations of the Committee. But they believed that with the present amount of information possessed by the public, suggestions might be made for amending the law; for making it more effective for removing, he trusted, some of the opposition to the law throughout the country, and, probably, for improving the administration of the law. For all these purposes he believed that a Committee at this time would be of great service.

Motion agreed to.

—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

And, on February 16, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, MR. STEPHEN CAVE, MR. CANDLISH, MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, MR. MUNTZ, LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, MR. JACOB BRIGHT, SIR SMITH CHILD, DR. LYON PLAYFAIR, MR. HOLT, MR. TAYLOR, SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN, DR. BREWER, MR. ALDERMAN CARTER, and MR. HIBBERT:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in moving that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Merchant Shipping and Navigation, said, he did not propose to trouble the House with any statement upon the merits of a Bill of that magnitude, and containing such a mass of details; but he had been anxious to introduce the Bill at a very early period, in order that a measure which must require so much time for examination even by those who were best acquainted with the subject should be as soon as possible in the hands of hon. Members. He intended to accompany the print of the Bill with a memorandum, which he hoped would be distributed in a few days, explaining the points in which the Bill would effect a change in the present law, and also the points in which it differed from the Bill introduced last year by his hon. Friend now the Under Secretary for the Home Department. He proposed to move the second reading in a few weeks, and on that occasion he would be ready to give any explanation that might be required. He need not say that it would be quite impossible to pass a Bill like this if details on numerous points were made the subject of contest in that House, or if hon. Gentlemen who were in favour of any great alteration in the present law which was not contained in the Bill were to insist on enforcing their views as against it. On the other hand, if they thought it would be a useful measure of consolidation and amendment he hoped they would give him their support in carrying it into law. No pains should be wanting on his part or on that of his Colleague, the Secretary of the Board of Trade, to facilitate the passing of the measure. He should be happy to confer with hon. Members upon any part of this Bill, which they might feel inclined to criticize or object to, and to meet them as far as his duty allowed. In that spirit, he trusted, it might be possible this year to pass the measure into law. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Merchant Shipping and Navigation.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE and Mr. ARTHUR PEEL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 15.]

SIR DENIS LE MARCHANT.

VOTE OF THANKS.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving a Vote of Thanks to Sir Denis Le Marchant, Baronet, upon his resignation of the office of Clerk of the House, said—I rise to propose, in conformity with the past usage of this House, that we should express in a befitting manner to you, Mr. Speaker, as the proper organ of this House, our sense of the manner in which Sir Denis Le Marchant has discharged the duties of Clerk. Sir Denis Le Marchant is a very old public servant, numbering more than 40 years of work in offices all of which were arduous, and the latter part of which have been given to the service of this House—years that certainly have been very remarkable. I imagine that this House has very long enjoyed the honour of being the most laborious, by far, of all the Legislative Assemblies of the world, and, during all the period of the existence of this House, there have been none in which its labours have been more arduous or more unremitting than during the last 20 or 21 years. During the whole of that time Sir Denis Le Marchant has been the Principal Officer at the Table of this House, and every Gentleman who has had any experience of the proceedings in Parliament knows well, from his own observation, how exacting and exhaustive are the labours which the Clerks at the Table undergo, and how kindly and how thoroughly efficient is the assistance which every Member of the House receives at the Table on all occasions in the discharge of his duties. I, therefore, am quite sure that the House will be heartily disposed to join in the tribute which I now propose. It is right that I should also refer to that portion of the duty of the Principal Clerk at the Table which consists in the government of a portion of the large establishment attached, and necessarily attached, to this House for the performance of its varied duties. Though, perhaps, it is not easy for most of us to speak from personal experience of the merits of any particular officer in the discharge of functions such as these, it so happened that, during the time I held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, I had the opportunity of seeing something of Sir Denis Le Marchant in this capacity, and of learning from those who were most competent to judge how those functions had been discharged. And I believe that in that province—one undoubtedly of great moment to the good conduct of the business of this House—Sir Denis Le Marchant was distinguished by a fair and equitable spirit, and by his great desire to promote the efficiency of the establishment over which he presided by doing justice to all parties concerned. His resignation is undoubtedly matter of regret; it reminds us all of our transitory condition, and that we must submit to the law that governs us; but it is some consolation to be enabled to express a friendly regret, in the terms of a Motion such as this, at the separation when it comes.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: I think it is due to an old officer of this House, who has performed public duties, as stated by my right hon. Friend opposite, for 40 years, of which 20 years have been spent in this House, that he should not pass from our service without the testimony borne to his character being conveyed to him from both sides of this House. I agree in every word which has been stated by my right hon. Friend opposite with regard to Sir Denis Le Marchant. One portion of his duties I am, perhaps, better able to speak of from personal observation and experience; I allude to those functions which my right hon. Friend mentioned in the latter part of his observations—the appointment of the officers of this House. I am quite sure that Members who have taken part in the Committees of this House must have been struck with the able manner in which the Clerks of this House performed their duties. All these were under the appointment of Sir Denis Le Marchant; and I think the manner in which these offices are filled, and in which their duties are performed, speaks highly for his soundness of judgment and discretion. My right hon. Friend has spoken of the courtesy which was always shown to Members of this House by Sir Denis Le Marchant. It is, of course, the duty of the Clerks at the Table to render every assistance they can to Members of this House in the performance of their duty to their constituents; but everything depends upon the manner in which this is done; and even in their presence, I will say that our thanks are due, not only to Sir Denis Le Marchant, but to those who have sat beside him for many years past, for the courteous manner in which they have rendered that assistance. I cordially agree in every compliment that has been paid to Sir Denis Le Marchant, and I heartily second the Vote that has been proposed.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That Mr. Speaker be requested to acquaint Sir Denis Le Marchant, baronet, that this House desires to express its sense of the manner in which he has uniformly discharged the duties of his important office during his long attendance in the service of this House.

NORWICH WRIT.

MR. GLYN moved—

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Norwich, in the room of Jacob Henry Tillett, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void.”

MR. D. DALRYMPLE rose for the purpose of making a very brief explanation in consequence of what occurred in this House last Session, when he took some pains to remove from the list of persons reported as being guilty of corruption a voter named Ray. He now confessed he was entirely taken in, and had he known that Ray was guilty of the shabby bribery now proved against him he certainly would not have said a word in his behalf. He thought, however, it was a grave defect in our election law that such men as Lacy and Ray should, in consequence of the lapse of time, be beyond the reach of the punishment which was inflicted on another briber who was most justly undergoing his punishment for the same offence at the same election. Lapse of time did not protect a Member, and he thought the same rule ought to be extended to all persons reported to the House as being guilty of bribery. He believed Ray was rightly taken out of the Schedule, as he was put into it for being concerned in the show of hands, and Mr. Justice Keating in his Report made no allusion to that subject.

MR. C. S. READ wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government intended to bring in a Bill for the disfranchisement of those Norwich voters who were reported by Mr. Justice Keating to have been guilty of bribery at the last election, and whether such persons would be entitled to record their votes at the next election?

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Norwich, in the room of Jacob Henry Tillett, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void.—(Mr. Glyn.)

UNION RATING (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. M'MAHON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to assimilate the Law for the relief of the poor in Ireland to that of England, by substituting Union Rating for the present system of Rating by Electoral Divisions, said, as he understood a Committee was to be appointed to inquire into the subject, he would not press the second reading of the Bill until after the Committee had reported.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman had not made that announcement he should have felt it his duty to take the unusual course of opposing the introduction of the Bill, the only object of which was to relieve some rich men, landlords, and towns from certain burdens and spread them over the rural districts of Ireland, to the disadvantage of the enormous majority of the inhabitants. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to ignore the fact of the existence of the head of the Poor Law Board (who was a Member of the Cabinet), a Secretary to the Poor Law Board, and of a Chief Secretary for Ireland, and wished to take any alteration entirely out of their hands. He was quite satisfied that a full inquiry would prove that the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite in the wrong. It was a great mistake to speak of there having been any assimilation of the Irish to the English system, for the former carefully avoided all the errors of the latter; and the introduction of Union rating would not assimilate the two systems. When a question had been submitted to and decided by a Committee of the House, as this question had been, the House ought not hastily to overturn the decision of that Committee. The inquiry was made in 1861; there was a division in the Committee on this question; the voting was 10 to 3; and the names of the 10 showed that this was not a party question, for they were Mr. Monsell, Mr. H. Herbert, Mr. John Browne, Mr. George, Mr. Gregory, Sir Edward Grogan, Lord Naas, Mr. Quin, Mr. Cogan, and himself. Under these circumstances, he decidedly objected to an attempt to effect an alteration by a side-wind.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, but for want of time, it was the intention of the Government last Session to propose a Committee of Inquiry upon this question, which was one of considerable importance, was by no means so clear as the noble Lord opposite (Lord C. Hamilton) seemed to suppose. It was a very proper subject of inquiry which the Government intended to promote. The terms of the Motion of last year, which he should move shortly, were—

He did not think the case had been so fully decided upon as the noble Lord wished them to believe. The Committee which investigated the subject of the Poor Law in Ireland did not devote any great part of its time to this particular point, and some of those who were most able to give an opinion on the working of the Poor Law in Ireland were very much in favour of the proposal now made. In agreeing to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. M'Mahon), he expressed a hope that time would be allowed for the Committee to finish its labours before the Bill was put down for a second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to assimilate the Law for the relief of the poor in Ireland to that of England by substituting Union Rating for the present system of Rating by Electoral Divisions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'MAHON, Mr. DOWNING, and Mr. STACPOOLE.

SELECT COMMITTEE—University Tests, nominated.

DISPUTES WITH THE UNITED STATES. THE JOINT COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

LORD CAIRNS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the absence of the Papers on American affairs promised in Her Majesty's Speech, he will state if the object of the Joint Commission is to settle the questions in dispute between the United States and British North America and the questions between the United States and this country connected with the late war, or only to determine a mode in which such questions may be placed in a way of settlement; and also whether this country will be bound by the determinations of a majority of the Commission; and whether there is in the Commission any and what provision for an umpirage in the event of the Commission being equally divided?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble and learned Lord did not mention in the House his intention of putting the Question, and having been obliged to go to Windsor with two foreign Ministers, I have only just seen his Notice; but I have no hesitation in answering his Question. Perhaps it would be the better course to read a short extract from the Commission itself—

“They are appointed for the purpose of discussing in a friendly spirit with Commissioners to be appointed by the Government of the United States the various questions on which differences have arisen between Great Britain and that country, and of treating for an agreement as to the mode of their amicable settlement.”

The noble and learned Lord will understand, therefore, that the Commissioners are not arbitrators, empowered to make a final settlement of the questions by their own authority; but supposing them to come to an agreement as to the mode of settlement—in accordance with the Instructions of their respective Governments—then they will report to their respective Governments. In order that a treaty may be entered into for referring the disputed questions to arbitration or to whatever mode, whether arbitration or otherwise, they may report. There is, therefore, no question of a majority or minority on the Commission. It would be inconvenient at present to read the entire Instructions given to the Commissioners, but I see no objection to quoting a sentence towards the end of them, which is as follows:—

“Her Majesty’s Government request, however, that if the mode of dealing with any particular matter which you may be disposed to agree to should vary materially from the manner of settlement to which I have informed you Her Majesty’s Government are prepared at once to assent, or in case of any disagreement of importance arising between yourselves and the American High Commissioners, you should at once report by telegraph and await further instructions.”

THE EARL OF CARNARVON was understood to ask whether the San Juan question was included in the scope of the Commission.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAIRNS rose to call attention to the Provisions of the Treaty of Paris (1856) as to the Black Sea, with reference to the statement lately made on this subject by the Prime Minister, and said—My Lords, remembering that a Conference is now sitting, I should have preferred observing silence on the subject to which I am anxious to ask your Lordships’ attention for a short time; but, inasmuch as we are given to understand that a very broad and explicit opinion has been already pronounced by the Prime Minister, notwithstanding the sitting of the Conference, and inasmuch as some statements of fact made by him, as we understand, on the same occasion, have created some surprise, I cannot but feel that the proper time to take notice of the matter is the present. It might otherwise be said hereafter that those statements were made in the face of Parliament, and were unchallenged at the time, and that they must, therefore, be supposed to have commanded the assent of Parliament. It will be in your Lordships’ recollection that the Treaty signed at Paris in 1856 contained a clause for the neutralization of the Black Sea. The terms of the 11th Article are—

“The Black Sea is neutralized; its waters and its ports, thrown open to the mercantile marine of every nation, are formally and in perpetuity interdicted to the flag of war, either of the Powers possessing its coasts or of any other Power, with the exceptions mentioned in Articles XIV. and XIX. of the present Treaty.”

These exceptions permit the Russian and Ottoman Governments to keep a limited number of small gunboats for the service of the coasts of the Black Sea. Your Lordships may also recollect that the Crimean War, which commenced in 1854, was interrupted in 1855 by negotiations conducted at Vienna, which at one time seemed likely to result in the establishment of peace. Those negotiations were twice broken off and twice renewed. On each occasion they were broken off on the very point on which they were ultimately, in June 1855, abandoned—namely, on the mode of reducing, as it was termed, the preponderance of the power of Russia in the Black Sea. Two modes by which that object might be effected were proposed. One was that Russia should not be prevented from maintaining a naval force in the Black Sea, but that other Powers should be at liberty to maintain a force of equal magnitude. On that point the late Lord Clarendon always held in his despatches the same language—namely, that that was not the form of giving effect to the object in view which this country would approve, as it would lead to a constant state of preparation for war in the East, instead of to a peace that might be expected to prove lasting. The other solution of the difficulty was that proposed originally, I think, by France, and warmly taken up by Lord Clarendon on behalf of the British Government. It was looked upon somewhat coldly by Austria, but supported, I believe, to a certain extent by her. This alternative was the neutralization of the Black Sea. Your Lordships may remember that in the negotiations at Vienna four heads or bases were constantly referred to. I believe I am right in stating that the first two were substantially agreed to, while the third was this question of the reduction of Russian naval preponderance, on which the negotiations were twice interrupted and finally abandoned. The fourth head was never touched; but there is no reason to suppose that had the difficulty as to the third been surmounted it might not have been easily arranged. I have thus shortly reminded your Lordships of the position of affairs at that time. I will not trouble you with quotations from Lord Clarendon's despatches, for the difficulty would be to know what to select, since every page is full of the expression of his views on this point. When, moreover, the negotiations were broken off, a circular was addressed by him to our diplomatic agents in different countries, giving a narrative of the course they had taken, and assigning as the reason for their termination that which I have mentioned. He appealed to the protocols of the Conference as evidence showing how well founded was the determination of the Western Powers to insist on the cessation of Russian preponderance in the Black Sea as alone offering any real security for Turkey and Europe against any ulterior designs on the part of Russia. The Conference of Vienna having come to an end, the war consequently went on during the autumn and winter, resulting in the further defeat of Russia; and finally the Treaty of Paris was concluded, in which Russia assented to terms which she had before positively refused—including the neutralization of the Black Sea. This being so, it was with no small surprise that I read expressions recently used, if he had been correctly reported, by the Prime Minister. He is reported to have said that if this country were now to insist on this Article of the Treaty we should not have the co-operation of Austria. I do not dwell on that statement, for very possibly there is some foundation for it, for anyone can see that Austria was very unwilling at the time of the Conferences at Vienna to be a party to any terms irksome to Russia with regard to the Black Sea. The Prime Minister also said that France, by her official acts, had expressed her readiness to give up the neutralization of the Black Sea. Now, as to that point, so far as I know, or any of your Lordships have been informed, no document has yet been produced, having the character of an official act, showing that France is prepared to give up this part of the Treaty. I have seen in newspapers statements of what France was prepared to do; but I am not aware of any official act of this character. What follows, however, is much more remarkable. Meeting an observation made by Mr. Disraeli that the Treaty of 1856, if it produced nothing else, produced one result of the utmost value and the most vital importance—namely, the neutralization of the Black Sea—the Prime Minister is reported to have said—"That was never, so far as I know, the view of the British Government." Now, this is a most startling statement. Unless we are all under a delusion—unless all the documents which are upon record are entirely baseless and inaccurate, it was not only the view of the British Government that the neutralization of the Black Sea was of vital importance, but it was the very point on which the Vienna negotiations broke off, and to attain which millions of money were expended and thousands of lives lost in continuing the war. The Prime Minister went on to say—

"In this House, in the year 1856, I declared my confident conviction that it was impossible to maintain the neutralization of the Black Sea."

Mr. Gladstone said this immediately after the sentence as to the view of the British Government. In 1856, however, Mr. Gladstone was not in Office, and his attitude in the House of Commons, if not one of opposition, was one of very careful, and frequently hostile, criticism of the Government of the day; yet, if he is correctly reported, his expressions amount to this—"I maintain that the neutralization of the Black Sea was never, in the view of the British Government, of vital importance, and I made a speech in 1856 insisting that it could not be maintained." So far Mr. Gladstone only is concerned;

but what follows concerns others. He says he does not speak from direct communication with Lord Clarendon, but he has been told since his death that Lord Clarendon never attached value to the neutralization. Now, this is a grave statement. I should say that it is a very grave imputation on the memory of Lord Clarendon; for it amounts to this—that when Lord Clarendon wrote despatches, one after another, insisting on the necessity of reducing Russian preponderance in the Black Sea and on its neutralization, and when he assumed the responsibility of advising the Crown to continue the war in order to obtain that end, he did not believe what he was writing, and was all along of opinion that no value was to be attached to the neutralization of the Black Sea. The Prime Minister continues—

“I do not speak from direct communication, but I have been told that Lord Palmerston always looked upon the neutralization as an arrangement which might be maintained and held together for a limited number of years, but which, from its character, it was impossible to maintain as a permanent condition for a great settlement of Europe.”

So that Lord Palmerston, who was Prime Minister at the time, plunged the country anew into war in order to obtain an arrangement to which he attached no idea of permanence, and when these stipulations were made, closing the Black Sea for ever to vessels of war, he knew that this arrangement could only be kept alive for a certain number of years. I do not know what is the authority for these statements. Opening almost at random the Papers laid on the Table yesterday, which it would be premature to discuss now, I observe that the Russian Minister at Constantinople seems to have told Sir Henry Elliot that Lord Palmerston had said the neutralization of the Black Sea could not be maintained ten years. Now, I do not think Lord Palmerston, looking to his official or public acts, believed or thought this; but even if he did, I think he was the very last man to tell a Russian diplomatic agent that this was his opinion. This is, so far as I know, the only foundation for the Prime Minister's statements. The question assumes greater magnitude when we connect it with some other events which have occurred. Your Lordships remarked with great surprise at the beginning of the winter a despatch addressed by Prince Gortchakoff to the Government of this country. I think I speak the sentiments of everyone present and of the great majority of the country when I say that the public were satisfied with the manner in which that despatch was, in the first instance, answered by the noble Earl opposite. All thought that the despatch was a most unwarrantable and unprecedented attempt to repudiate treaty engagements on the part of Russia, and that in point of form and manner it was as objectionable and censurable an act as was ever committed; but there was on the part of the public a very strong impression that there was something in the question much more than manner and form. The public recollected the Crimean War, they were quite aware of the object which we then had in view, and while they naturally resented the manner and form in which Russia repudiated her part of the Treaty, they felt that it was an attempt to subvert an arrangement to which this country attached great importance, and to set aside that security for the freedom of Turkey and for our own interests in the East which we had obtained at great cost and with great difficulty. They, therefore, regarded the manner and form as by no means the whole, or as perhaps even the gravest part, of the attempt itself. We all remember the excitement which prevailed on the Stock Exchange and throughout the country, and the general anxiety as to the further action of Russia, and the manner in which the noble Earl's answer would be received. I do not think I exaggerate when I say that people supposed we were possibly on the verge of an interruption of our friendly relations with Russia. Now, suppose that interruption, which we should all have deplored, had occurred, and suppose the public had afterwards been told that the whole controversy was merely upon the form and manner of the Russian despatch, and that what Russia was insisting on was, in substance, what the Prime Minister had always thought was the proper view of her rights, on what Lord Clarendon could never have seriously objected to, on what Lord Palmerston thought must come about in a few years—suppose the public had been told that the rupture was not on account of the substance, but merely the manner and form, what would they have thought? I think certainly they would have been much surprised at finding that this was all the while the view of the British Government, when these excellent and spirited despatches were being written at the Foreign Office. The result, as we know, is that the aim of Prince Gortchakoff has been accomplished—there is a Conference. The noble Earl, I observe—although objecting to limit the operations of the Conference in terms to the neutralization of the Black Sea—has stated his opinion that every effort should be made to limit the Conference to that question and to matters necessarily arising out of it. The case, therefore, is this—the Conference is to consider the demand of Russia that the neutralization should be put an end to. We all thought that, if such a proposition could be entertained at all, Russia must be prepared to offer an equivalent for that to which we attached great importance. But the Prime Minister comes forward, and in the face of Parliament gives an opinion that the point which the Conference is treating as a matter of controversy is not a matter of controversy at all; that he is of exactly the same opinion as the Emperor of Russia; that Lord Clarendon and Lord Palmerston were of the same view; and that France and Austria think the same. The noble Earl stipulated prior to the Conference that the Plenipotentiaries should enter it without any foregone conclusion; but the Plenipotentiaries of the Powers most concerned have entered it with foregone conclusions. Russia, of course, has determined in her own mind to put an end to the neutralization; and I greatly fear that the Representative of this country has entered it also with the foregone conclusion, expressed by the Prime Minister, that the neutralization must be given up. I should have been glad not to touch on any point relating to the Conference, but under present circumstances I wish to ask, What is the foundation for the statement that Lord Clarendon attached no value to the neutralization of the Black Sea, and that Lord Palmerston thought it an arrangement which could be maintained only for a few years? I would also ask, Whether the question of neutralization is any longer a question of controversy, or whether it has passed out of the sphere of negotiation and arrangement at the Conference?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I cannot think that the noble and learned

Lords has taken a very convenient course. The Papers on the subject were presented only yesterday, and, though this circumstance does not affect me, the noble and learned Lord admits that he has only been able to take a very superficial view of them. The noble and learned Lord did not give Notice in the House of his intention, but merely put it down on the Paper. As I have already explained, I was unavoidably obliged to leave London early this morning—before I got the Minutes—in order to present two foreign Ministers at Windsor, and I only got back just in time to reach the House. Of this I do not complain in the least, for if I had been the whole day in London it would not have enlightened me with regard to the Notice, which is certainly one of the vaguest which I ever saw on the Minutes. Indeed, I should like to refer to a noble Viscount (Viscount Eversley), who formerly presided over the other House, whether such a Notice as this would have been inserted at all on the Votes of the House of Commons—

“To call attention to the provisions of the Treaty of Paris (1856) as to the Black Sea, with reference to the statement on this subject lately made by the Prime Minister.”

Anything less specific it is impossible to imagine. I have not seen Mr. Gladstone, and have not been able to ask him whether he has been correctly reported or not. The noble and learned Lord blames Mr. Gladstone for having introduced this question at a time when it is before the Conference. I beg leave to say that he did not introduce it; it was Mr. Disraeli who introduced it, and argued it at great length, saying, among other things, that the neutralization of the Black Sea was the one vital and important point in the Treaty of 1856. I think Mr. Gladstone might properly have remained silent; but, if so, what would have happened? We should have had, as we had last year, the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), and others, in both Houses, complaining bitterly of Mr. Gladstone's reticence on foreign policy when he ought to declare every view of the Government upon it. I do not know whether the words are reported or not; but I was a Member of Lord Palmerston's Government, and I certainly go with Mr. Gladstone in saying that we did not regard this neutralization of the Black Sea as the one vital part of the Treaty of 1856. They were most important stipulations, and I say—and I cannot imagine that Mr. Gladstone meant to convey a different impression—that we attached very great importance to those stipulations at the time and in the circumstances of the case. In one respect, things are now very different; for Turkey has now one of the most powerful fleets in the world, whereas at that time she was without an armed vessel she could call her own. I do not wish to enter into a matter on which I am the negotiator for this country in a Conference which is going on and will meet again this week. The noble and learned Lord asks whether I can answer for Lord Clarendon's opinion. Well, there is not the slightest doubt that Lord Clarendon was very anxious for these stipulations at the time. There were persons out of the Government who took a different opinion—Lord Aberdeen, for instance, and, if I remember rightly, the noble Earl on the cross Benches (Earl Grey) were opposed to these stipulations, as also some of my present Colleagues. Sir Roundell Palmer was much opposed to them, and Mr. Layard, who usually put himself forward as a friend of Turkey, strongly deprecated them. I admit that Lord Clarendon, and all of us at the time, thought they were an important and good arrangement. The noble and learned Lord says Mr. Gladstone states that he has heard that Lord Clarendon did not attach importance to them. All that I can say is, that I was informed, on what appeared to be good authority, of exactly the same thing. I have taken some pains to inquire, and I have ascertained that there is no evidence whatever that Lord Clarendon changed his opinion. He might have done so, but I have found no authority for it. I mentioned this to Mr. Gladstone the day after his speech, and said—"You seem to have been misled in the same way that I was; I have made inquiries, and I believe there is no proof of anything of the sort." Mr. Gladstone, of course, accepted the correction, and he will, no doubt, be happy to make the same declaration. With regard to Lord Palmerston, I am bound to say that the evidence is rather of a different character. The noble and learned Lord objected to what the Russian Ambassador told Sir Henry Elliott, and he will probably object, therefore, to what the Russian Ambassador told me. General Ignatieff told me that he remarked to Lord Palmerston—"These are stipulations which you cannot expect will last long," and Lord Palmerston replied—"They will last 10 years." A learned civilian, a great friend of mine, told me he heard Lord Palmerston talk on the same subject, and say—"Well, at all events, they will last my life." A noble Peer, a Colleague of mine, not at this moment present, an intimate friend of Lord Palmerston, says Lord Palmerston told him they would last seven years. Lord Palmerston certainly took occasion officially to represent to the Turkish Government his opinion that within 10 years from the time of the Treaty Russia would certainly be at war with them. He warned them of their danger, and told them that upon them the stress must lie; that they must look not only to their naval and military, but their financial condition, and that by good government towards all their subjects, without distinction, they must obtain their full support, so as to be able to defend themselves in an emergency, which he apprehended, but which, luckily, has not occurred. There is a great deal I could say on the subject of the Treaty of 1856 and any possible revision of its Articles, but I think your Lordships will agree with me that, being officially engaged in the Conference on the part of this country, it would be injudicious for me in the House of Lords to argue or give my individual opinion about different Articles of that Treaty. There is one thing I feel excessively grateful for—that we went into Conference before the noble and learned Lord had made his speech of to-night. The noble and learned Lord has treated Prince Gortchakoff's despatch as a mere matter of manner and form. Now, I believe there is nothing more important than what he calls a form. I believe that if this country and the rest of Europe had submitted without resistance to the denunciation of solemn obligations to which we were guarantees, a more severe blow would have been struck not only at the character and position of this country in Europe, but at the validity of all treaties, than it is easy to conceive. I am glad, therefore, that that part of his speech was delivered after we had been some days in Conference, and not before our sittings commenced.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Earl (Earl Granville) has been kind enough to make an allusion to me; why, I do not know. It seems to me that the accusation that I should have complained of the reticence of the Prime Minister had he abstained from throwing down his policy before Parliament at a time when it was a subject of negotiation with foreign Powers, is an accusation which could not be made against me or any single Member of either House. Reticence under such circumstances is what I should not only not have complained of, but should have been very grateful for. No doubt the negotiations are carried on with the utmost skill by the noble Earl opposite. I do not know what securities he may have to try and extract from the Russian Government; but I certainly join in his congratulations that the negotiations began before Parliament met, and before the Prime Minister had the opportunity of telling the country and the world that the object for which they were carried on was, in his opinion, perfectly worthless. I should like to know—but the noble Earl must use his official discretion in the matter—whether the Prime Minister was equally frank in his confidences to the Plenipotentiaries as he was the other day to the House of Commons? I should like to know what their feelings were when they read his speech the next morning, and whether they did not suggest to the noble Earl that, as far as the substance of it was concerned, they might as well return home? I do not believe we shall find in Parliamentary history any instance of a Prime Minister throwing discredit on the very cause which his Plenipotentiary was engaged in maintaining at the time negotiations were going on. Another very serious criticism may be passed on Mr. Gladstone's speech. We suffer a good deal from the constant change of the public men at the head of affairs. This country has to maintain unity of policy in the face of foreign countries as though the same brain always conceived, the same mouth announced, and the same hand executed that policy; yet men of the most opposite views have to concur in maintaining it, and the man who denounces the policy of a Minister one day may the next day be called upon to carry it out and see it to its fair conclusion. Such has been the case with Mr. Gladstone. In 1856 he was denouncing the policy of neutralization in terms to which Prince Gortchakoff himself could have seen little to add. None of us who heard that eloquent speech can forget how he pointed to that neutralization—to that part of one of the four bases of negotiation—as the point on which the negotiations were broken off, and as the cause of the sacrifice of fresh victims to the demand of military fame. I well remember how eloquently he denounced that policy. In the course of events it became his duty to maintain the policy that he had opposed, and to sustain that which his predecessors, his Sovereign, and the country had stamped as the policy of the British Empire. That was his duty to-day. It would be absolutely fatal to the performance of this delicate and difficult duty if, when negotiations are going on, a Prime Minister may come forward and refer to his own personal feelings, when expressed in Opposition, as a means of damaging and discrediting the policy of the country. About a year after the China debates the late Lord Derby took Office, and it became his duty to give some expression of opinion with reference to the prosecution of the Chinese War. He was taunted because he did not in Office reiterate the opinions adverse to the war which he had expressed in Opposition. But my belief is that that was the only true and patriotic course. A man, of course, cannot act contrary to his own sincere conviction; but he is constitutionally bound when he accedes to Office to be silent on his own former objections to the policy which he has inherited, and to do his utmost by judicious reticence, by silence, by discretion, by carefulness in the use of language, to maintain that unity of policy which is essential to the conduct of foreign affairs of a great nation, but is so difficult under a constitutional Government such as ours. This is another and serious objection to the course the Prime Minister has pursued. I agree with the noble Earl (Earl Granville) as to the inconvenience of this discussion. I only say it was commenced by the Prime Minister, and the responsibility for all the inconvenience—and I fear much greater inconvenience was felt within the walls of the Conference-room—lies with him and not with us.

House adjourned at Six o'clock,

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution reported—Ordered—First Reading—Princess Louise's Annuity* [24].

Ordered—Habitual Drunkards.

Ordered—First Reading—Public Parks, &c. (Land) [25]; Local and Personal Acts (Ireland) [26]; Trades Unions [28]; Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal [27]; Charities, &c. Exemption [23]; County Property* [29]; County Courts (Jurisdiction and Procedure)* [31]; Game Laws Amendment* [30]; Incolure Law Amendment [32].

INCOME TAX RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. HERMON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that, in opposition to the decision of this House on the 9th June last, his assessors did issue forms for returns of Income Tax requiring employers to state the amounts of the salaries they paid to their clerks and assistants?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he must first correct the hon. Gentleman's Question. The assessors were not his assessors in the sense that they were the assessors of the Treasury. Practically, they were officers appointed by the district commissioners, over whom he had no control; he could not, therefore, give as much information on the subject as he would have been able to do if the assessors had been directly under the Treasury. He stated, however, that two kinds of forms were issued—one designed for companies, with a column for the salaries of those employed, as under the old system; the other for private firms, requiring the names of those liable to be assessed, and the position they occupied, but not requiring a statement of the salaries given. The presumption, therefore, was that what the hon. Member complained of had not been done.

MR. HERMON stated, in reply, that a form such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer described as being exclusively designed for companies had been left with his own firm.

NAVAL PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he is aware that much dissatisfaction exists among naval officers serving on foreign stations on account of the fact that the scale of distribution of prize money now in force (and which dates as far back as 1836), is unduly in favour of the flag officers in port; and, whether it is intended to revise that scale?

MR. BAXTER, in reply, said, the Order in Council regulating the distribution of naval prize money was dated in 1866, and not in 1836. In the early part of the present century the share of naval officers serving on foreign stations amounted to one-eighth, but since then it had undergone many changes. It was now fixed at one-thirtieth, and he was not aware that any dissatisfaction prevailed. The amount for distribution was so small that it was scarcely possible to make a more equitable distribution than that made at present.

NAVY—SHIPS OF WAR.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Committee on Designs of Ships of War have made any recommendation on the subject of the ironclads "Devastation," "Thunderer," "Fury," "Hecate," "Hydra," "Gorgon," and "Cyclops," or any of them, and whether the opinion expressed as to the designs of these ships is favourable or otherwise?

MR. BAXTER, in reply, said, no recommendation of any kind had been made by the Committee.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION.—QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Government is prepared to give powers to enforce attendance at schools in those districts where there are no school Boards; and, if so, to what authority?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that no doubt his right hon. Friend was aware that the Elementary Education Act of last Session gave powers to school Boards to compel the attendance at school throughout the districts over which they had control; the Government was not prepared to give additional powers for compelling attendance, nor would it be expedient to introduce a measure for a special purpose such as this.

CATTLE DISEASE—IMPORTATION OF INFECTED BEASTS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he can give an explanation to the Statement which appeared in a Letter to the "Times" of the 31st of January, viz.—

"That a cargo of beasts from Holland landed at Thames Haven last week was passed by the Inspectors there as sound. These animals were taken thence to the Maiden Lane Station, Holloway, and thence to the market lairs, where on close inspection several of the beasts were found to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia?"

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that immediately on his attention being called to the statement referred to in The Times he caused inquiries to be made into the rumour, and so far as the Department could ascertain the statement was entirely without foundation. The Inspector of the markets stated that he had not detected any case of pleuro-pneumonia in the lairs, and what confirmed his statement was this—by the Act passed a year or two ago the owners of animals so affected were bound to give notice under a penalty of £20, and he thought that if any of the animals had been affected the owners would have given the required notice rather than incur the penalty.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—SINKING OF BRITISH VESSELS.—QUESTION.

MR. EUSTACE SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are taking any and what steps to obtain compensation for the seamen and others who lost their employment and effects through the sinking of their vessels in the Seine by the Prussians?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government, as soon as they learnt that British ships had been sunk in the Seine by the Prussians, took immediate steps to bring the matter under the official notice of Count Bismarck, who at once answered that full compensation should be given. There is no reason to doubt that this will be done as soon as the various claims can be substantiated and adjusted. Papers will be laid very shortly upon the Table of the House with reference to this question.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL. LEAVE.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law of Lunacy, and to provide for the Management of Habitual Drunkards, said, the measure differed in a very slight degree from the one he proposed last year; and that difference was caused by the desire to surround the liberty of the subject with somewhat greater safeguards. As the Government did not object to the introduction of the Bill, he would not now detain the House with any observations further than to remark that he trusted that the hilarity with which the Notice he gave of the measure was met on Thursday last would vanish when the gravity of the subject came to be fairly discussed by the House. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law of Lunacy and to provide for the Management of Habitual Drunkards, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DONALD DALRYMPLE, Mr. GORDON, Mr. FRASER, and Mr. DOWNING.

PUBLIC PARKS, &c. (LAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR WILLIAM HUTT, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate gifts of Land for Public Parks, Schools, and Museums, said, the Bill contemplated the same change in the law that was recommended by a Committee of that House which sat in 1852 to inquire into the law of mortmain, and of which Committee he was a Member. That Committee comprised some of the most eminent Members of the House, who were selected as being the representatives of conflicting opinions on the difficult question of mortmain law; and those Gentlemen, though differing among themselves on many of the points submitted to their decision, all agreed that it was expedient to repeal so much of the law of mortmain as presented any obstacle to the formation throughout the country of parks, schools, and museums, or other means of giving education and enjoyment to the people. That was the unanimous resolution of the Committee, and it was reported to the House. Seventeen or 18 years had since passed away, and, unfortunately, no step whatever had been taken in the matter. To show that the conclusion arrived at by the Committee was a sound and well-advised one, he might observe that the Law of Mortmain—as the 9 Geo. II., c. 36, was generally, but he believed erroneously, called — rendered it practically impossible for anyone in this country to leave by will real property, or funds, to be afterwards applied to the acquisition of real property for any public institution, however meritorious or deserving support it might be. That sweeping enactment, so stringent in its character, was justified by Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, its promoter, as a measure necessary to prevent the alienation from the general purposes of the country of large landed estates and the consigning them to the grasp of permanent corporations and trusts. Lord Hardwicke enjoyed the highest reputation as a lawyer—indeed, he might, perhaps, be regarded rather as a pre-eminent lawyer than as a great statesman. He never forgot that there was a period in our history when ecclesiastical corporations held a very large portion of the soil of the country. Lord Hardwicke was too wise to believe that in his day such a mischievous state of things could recur. Still, he apprehended the recurrence of some possible modification of the evil, and he took these extraordinary precautions against it. Now, gifts of such shreds and patches of land as were necessary for carrying out the objects contemplated by the present Bill would hardly involve any appreciable infraction of the legislation of Lord Hardwicke. Even, however, were it otherwise, the House would be bound to weigh and compare the advantages resulting from the alienation of land for such purposes with the presumable evils that might arise on the other side. On that principle they were in the habit of acting in reference to the Private Bills promoted by commercial companies who asked for power to hold land essential to their operations, notwithstanding the prohibitions of the law of mortmain. The House granted such powers to railway, canal, dock, and other companies without scruple or restraint; and surely the education and the improvement of the condition of the people was a question which the House had as much at heart as the construction of railways. If the law of mortmain was rightly set aside in those cases it was not too much to ask that it should be set aside for such purposes as he proposed. Another view of the matter was that the hardship, the pains and penalties of the restriction fell almost exclusively on the poorer classes of the community. The man who was prohibited by law from leaving a rood of land as a site for a village school was yet permitted by express provision of the Mortmain Act to leave any extent of land or real property to the two great English Universities, to our great public schools, to a number of other great and flourishing institutions which existed in fact for the special benefit of the upper classes. Nobody, he thought, would undertake to defend such a distinction as that. In the memory of some who now heard him, the late Viscount Fitzwilliam bequeathed by will to the University of Cambridge £100,000 for the erection of a museum, for which he had otherwise splendidly provided. That museum was now one of the glories of the University to which he had the honour to belong. But had Lord Fitzwilliam been minded to leave that museum, not to the University of Cambridge, but to the people of Bradford, Birmingham, Manchester, or any one of those great hives of industry where a knowledge of the arts of design and instruction in the principles of taste could be so advantageously disseminated among the artizans, the gift would have been set aside by the inexorable enactments of the mortmain law. He said that was class legislation of a very obnoxious kind. He was sure that the representatives in that House of the great Universities of the land, naturally anxious as they were to promote their prosperity by every legitimate and honourable means, would not wish to maintain a distinction so invidious and so injurious to other classes. He felt convinced that those Gentlemen would say with him—and would lend him their aid in promoting a change in the law. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to facilitate gifts of Land for Public Parks, Schools, and Museums, ordered to be brought in by Sir WILLIAM HUTT and Sir STAFFORD NORTH-COTE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 25.]

LOCAL AND PERSONAL ACTS (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HERON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to diminish the expense and delay of passing Local and Personal Acts relating to Ireland through Parliament, said, the main object of the Bill was to establish a tribunal in Ireland before which all Bills relating to Local and Personal Acts should be brought and examined, instead of sending them direct to Parliament. The machinery for examination of the schemes would be precisely the same as that now applied to the trial of election petitions. The evidence would be taken by a Judge, who would report to a Parliamentary Office in Dublin, similar to the Local Government Office in this country, whereupon a Provisional Order would be issued, which would come before Parliament for confirmation. In order to show the necessity for such a measure, he might observe that in the recent legislation connected with Sligo the expense had been £14,000, that relating to Kingstown £6,000, and that relating to the Dublin Trunk Railway Bill £56,000.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to diminish the expense and delay of passing Local and Personal Acts relating to Ireland through Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HERON, Mr. PIM, and Mr. BAEWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 26.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. BRUCE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Trades Unions, said, it was always a matter for regret where delay occurred in the removal of admitted grievances, and it was agreed upon all sides that the subject of the large trades unions was one upon which legislation had been for some time urgently required. The delay which had occurred with reference to this subject was not, however, without compensation, because it had afforded time for the examination of the great mass of evidence which had been accumulated by the Commission which had been appointed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. S. Walpole) in 1867, which would aid greatly in framing a useful measure. He (Mr. Bruce) regarded the subject as a delicate and a difficult one, and one which required him to appeal to the consideration of the House; but he was cheered in the task he had undertaken by the recollection of what had occurred in 1869, when the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) brought on his Bill for a second reading. On that occasion the House was addressed by several hon. Members, themselves large employers of labour, some of whom had been signal sufferers from strikes, and the fairness with which the discussion was conducted inspired him with the greatest confidence in appealing to the sense of justice of the House. The only objection to the Bill came from the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. E. Potter) who, however, limited his objection to the consideration that, inasmuch as ignorance had a great deal to do with trade outrages, an Education Bill ought to precede a Trades Union Bill, and that that Bill should contain a strong compulsory power. Such a measure had passed the House, although not exactly fulfilling all the conditions desired by his hon. Friend. Before proceeding to describe the Bill he proposed to introduce on the part of the Government, he desired to advert to the laws which had regulated the relations between master and servant. The first Act upon the subject was a very memorable one. It was passed in signal defiance of that which was assumed to be a maxim of political economy—namely, that, with certain limitations, the price of labour must always be regulated by the relation of demand and supply. The Statute of Labourers was passed in the reign of Edward III. In that reign occurred the terrible scourge called the Black Death, by which one-third of the people was supposed to have been carried off. The decreased number of labourers led them to demand increased wages, and thereupon the Statute of Labourers, was passed, enacting—

“That every person, able in body and under the age of 60 years, not having enough to live upon, being required, shall be bound to serve him that doth require him, or else be committed to gaol until he shall find surety to serve, and that the old wages shall be given and no more;”

Showing that industry was then regarded as a duty to the State; idleness a crime; that it was the duty of the Government to compel every man to work, and to secure him proper wages and terms, but not to allow him to contract freely for himself. In the 5th year of Elizabeth another Act was passed, repealing the former ones on the same subject and consolidating them. That

statute was called the Statute of Apprentices, and remained in force until the year 1816. By this statute the acceptance of work was made compulsory, the hours of labour were fixed—first, in husbandry, and subsequently, by the statute of 1st James I., among artificers of all descriptions, by the justices of the peace at quarter sessions. Under this Act it was made a criminal offence in a single workman to receive more than the appointed rate of wages. Enactments were passed from time to time against combination in certain particular trades, culminating, in 1800, by an Act of George III. which gave summary jurisdiction for the conviction of workmen who, by intimidation, persuasion, or by other means, induced persons not to work, or who refused to work with other workmen. During this period the statutes passed for the protection of workmen were numerous; but they had all fallen into disuse, while the repressive measures were in full force. The result of this legislation was that, between the years 1800 and 1824, more cases of outrage and violence occurred than at any subsequent period, and there existed a worse state of relation between masters and workmen than at any former period. The extent of those outrages was such that a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed in 1824 to consider the whole subject. They recommended that the various statutes should be repealed, and that the common-law doctrine of conspiracy for restraint of trade should be abolished. That recommendation was carried into effect. The House was aware that the year 1825 was a most disastrous one in the annals of English commerce. The sufferings of the people were terrible, and, unfortunately, the workmen broke out into acts of great violence; great alarm prevailed; the offences committed by trade unionists, and other workmen, were attributed to the recent relaxation of the combination laws, and although sufficient time had not elapsed to give the Act of 1824 a fair trial, the Act 6th of George IV., was passed, which, with some modifications, was the law now in force. The result of the repeal of the preceding statutes was to re-place combinations of workmen under the common law of the land, which was thus described by Mr. Justice Grose in 1796—

“In many cases an agreement to do a certain thing has been considered as the subject of an indictment for a conspiracy, though the same act, if done separately by each individual without any agreement among themselves, would not have been illegal—as in the case of journeymen conspiring to raise their wages: each may insist upon raising his wages if he can; but, if several meet for the same purpose, it is illegal, and the parties may be indicted for a conspiracy.”

This was the common law of England, which justified Jeremy Bentham in saying that the word conspiracy served Judges for an excuse for inflicting punishment without stint on all persons by whom any act was committed which did not accord with the Judges' notions concerning the act in question; and Mr. Fitzjames Stephen's assertion that Judges exercised a modified power of legislation in declaring certain acts to be criminal—namely, the broad ground of immorality and tendency to injure the public—and that they did so by means of a fiction consisting in treating as a crime not the very acts intended to be punished, but certain ways of doing those acts. The common law on the subject of conspiracy, which rendered all trades unions illegal, was so far modified by an Act of George IV., that combinations for the purpose of raising wages, or limiting hours of labour, were no longer criminally punishable; but in all other respects it remained unchanged. It had, however, seldom, if ever, been applied for the purpose of criminal prosecutions, its application having been limited to the enforcement of certain civil disabilities, which grievously affected the interests of trades unions. Being tainted with illegality these unions were unable to protect themselves against the dishonesty of their officers, or to enter into any binding contract. The Friendly Societies Act, which was the first attempt to relieve trades unions of some of their disabilities—if, indeed, it was intended to affect them in any way, and this was a moot point—had a clause giving societies, “not being illegal,” the benefit of certain remedies against defaulting or dishonest servants. The question of the legality of the trades unions, which involved their right to avail themselves of this provision of the Friendly Societies Act, was discussed and decided by the cases of “Farrer v. Close,” and “Farrer v. Hornby,” in which cases the Court of Queen's Bench confirmed the decision of the local magistrates, to the effect that the trades unions could not prosecute an official who had embezzled funds, for the reason that those funds might have been applied for the purpose of maintaining a strike. But the Judges were not unanimous, and the opinion of Mr. Justice Hannen had so important a bearing on the question that he should venture to quote his words. The learned Judge said

"The tendency of this rule undoubtedly is to support and maintain the strike for a longer time, and so to increase the chance of the men obtaining the object of the strike. This, it is alleged, is in restraint of trade; that is, it disturbs the course, and postpones the effect of competition among the men, which, if left to itself, might sooner compel them to return to work, and this, it is contended, is contrary to public policy. I think that our judgment ought not to be based on this line of argument. By the expression that a thing is contrary to 'public policy,' I understand that it is meant that it is opposed to the welfare of the community at large. I can see that the maintenance of strikes may be against the interest of the employers, because they may be thereby forced to yield, at their own expense, a large share of profit or other advantage to the employed; but I have no means of judicially determining that this is contrary to the interest of the whole community; and I think that in deciding that it is, and therefore that any act done in its furtherance is illegal, we should be basing our judgment not on recognized legal principles, but on the opinion of one of the contending schools of political economists."

From disabilities like these the Royal Commissioners were unanimously of opinion that trades unions should be relieved, and they proposed to extend a full measure of protection to their funds. In fact, the law as it stood is one-sided and unjust. For while nearly every combination of workmen in furtherance of their objects was held to be a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and therefore criminally punishable, precisely similar acts committed by a master escaped the notice of the law, as not involving the offence of conspiracy. But, in fact, the employer of some thousands of workmen was, in himself, a combination. Within the last 10 days a case in point had come officially within his cognizance. The owners of a colliery in Staffordshire dismissed two men who had charge of an engine used to raise men out of the pits, and replaced them by two other men who had very little experience, and who, on several occasions, endangered the lives of the workmen. The men, considering their lives to be imperilled, made a representation for the removal of the incompetent enginemen; but the owners refused to accede to the request. In consequence of a request preferred to the Home Office, an Inspector was sent to the spot, who reported that the charges of incompetency brought against the newly employed enginemen were true. Thereupon the two were dismissed, and one was subsequently summoned for neglect of duty and fined. In that case, if the workmen whose lives were endangered by the employment of the incompetent enginemen had refused to work they would have rendered themselves legally responsible under the laws relating to combinations, and liable to punishment; while, in a moral point of view, they were fully justified in so doing. Probably they would not have been punished severely; but still that was the actual state of the common law. Yet the master, with perfect safety to himself, could dismiss any number of men, for reasons most inadequate, without incurring any liability. In order to remove another grievance, much complained of, and enable trades unions to protect their funds, the right hon. the Recorder introduced a Bill enabling members of trades unions to prosecute any of their officers who might embezzle their funds, notwithstanding that it had been held that the accumulation of funds in the hands of such societies for the purpose of maintaining strikes made them illegal societies. But the means of redress provided by the right hon. and learned Gentleman were not summary—they were circuitous and expensive; and, as the unionists required a more convenient remedy, he himself (Mr. Bruce) brought in a Bill in 1869, and continued it in 1870, declaring that trades unions should have the same summary means of proceeding against their defaulting officers which was possessed by friendly societies. But, although that grievance had been dealt with, there were others that had not hitherto been remedied. By the law, as it at present stood, these bodies could enter into no binding contract with any third person. Their secretary could not recover at law the salary which might be due to him for his services; nor could the union maintain an action against their bankers for money deposited on their account; while, if they rented premises for the purposes of their society, in case of dispute with their landlord they were without any remedy at law. To remove these disabilities was one of the objects of the Bill. The Bill also proposed to deal with the criminal law as it affected trades unionists and other workmen, whether acting in combination or singly. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) had, in 1869, introduced a Bill which, besides relieving trades unions from their civil disabilities, repealed the 6th George IV., and left the offences therein specified of workmen against each other, or against their employers, to be dealt with by the common law—that is, by indictment. No doubt there were many of the graver offences, such as murder, outrages against the person, and injury to property, which were punished with sufficient, if not occasionally with excessive, severity under the general law of the land. The repealed Act of 5th George IV. empowered the magistrates to inflict a summary imprisonment of three months in case of violence to the person, or injury to property; of threats or intimidation; in furtherance of the objects of unions; or in interference with the employment of labour. The alteration introduced by that Act was simply that the magistrates could give three months imprisonment in cases of violence, or injury to property, where before they could only have given two, while it gave summary jurisdiction in the cases of intimidation and threats, instead of merely binding over offenders to keep the peace. These summary powers were considerably extended by the Act of 6 George IV., which first introduced the offences of “obstruction” and “molestation,” and the complaints against this Act were—first, that its provisions were levelled against one particular class of men; and, next, that the offences created by it were so vague and general that the powers conferred upon the justices were liable to abuse. The proposal that he had to make on the part of the Government was, that with respect to all conspiracies in restraint of trade, with the exception of a few matters to which he would subsequently refer, the 6th George IV. should be absolutely repealed, and that the trades unions should thereby be relieved of the majority of those disabilities. The Act of George IV. would accordingly be repealed; but the Bill he was asking leave to introduce would, though re-enacting the offences mentioned in the Act, endeavour to deal with these terms in a more defined form, so as to exempt the law from what he regarded as the just censure to which it was now exposed. The way in which they proposed to deal with the matter was as follows:—Threats and intimidation under the 6th George IV. were considered by Lord

Cranworth to have immediate reference to the words which preceded them, and only to be offences when they were levelled at person or property; but that opinion had been pretty generally overruled, and the interpretation given by Sir William Erle accepted—

“Threats to bring any form of evil on a man, it matters not what degree of evil, and the evil may be inflicted in respect of the manifold interests relating to person, property, reputation, or affection.”

What had been the consequence of that very wide definition? One of the most constant sources of prosecution had arisen from notices of strikes served upon masters, and these were held to constitute “intimidation” under the Act. Undoubtedly, a notice of a coming strike might be conveyed to a master in a very threatening manner; but it might also be given solely with a peaceful object, and by way of information—in fact, one or two cases had occurred where men had been imprisoned on this account, although it was acknowledged that the notices had been given in a most respectful manner. One of the witnesses before the Commission, a Mr. M'Donald, who was secretary to the House Painters Union at Manchester, stated that on one occasion one of the members of the union to which he belonged had spread a report that another member was a convicted thief. The subject was inquired into—it being one of their rules that all the members should be persons of good character, and the story was ascertained to be false. The person who circulated the calumny was called upon to pay a fine, and refused to do so. The members of the union then had recourse to a proceeding which he (Mr. Bruce) for one, did not for a moment defend. Mr. M'Donald was directed to call upon the master, and tell him that unless this man was dismissed the other workmen would give up their employment. Mr. M'Donald's argument was this—Under any circumstances these men would have refused to work in this man's society; if these men had left their employment without stating the reason, the master might afterwards have said—“Why did you not tell me what your difficulty was? If you had stated to me what had occurred, there would have been no trouble, for I should not have retained the man in my employment.” And yet, as Mr. M'Donald stated, such an explanation might have subjected the workmen concerned in it to imprisonment. In the Bill he (Mr. Bruce) was asking leave to introduce, it was proposed that threats and intimidation should be punishable summarily, but only in those cases in which, apart from the Act of George IV., they would have subjected the offenders to be bound over to keep the peace—namely, where violence was threatened to a man, his wife or child, or where the threat was to burn his house. Now, as to molestation, the definition given by a learned Judge was “anything unpleasant or annoying to the mind operated on,” and the following acts had been held to be acts of molestation:—Persuading men to leave work in breach of contract; persuading men to leave work not in breach of contract where the strike did relate to questions of wages or hours; black looks; unpleasant words or catechizing a workman short of abusive language or gesture; acts not sufficient to be an actionable nuisance to residence; acts not sufficient to be an actionable damage to reputation. Now he (Mr. Bruce) was not prepared to say that there were not many acts of molestation from which workmen, in his opinion, ought to be protected by law; but still there was much in the present state of the law that was justly open to complaint, and the object of the Government in the alterations which they proposed to introduce was to remove this hardship, and to define those offences in which it was, as they thought, the province of the law to interfere. The manner in which the Government proposed to act was to define the offences selected from among a large catalogue of similar offences as being those which, without involving actual violence, were open demonstrations akin to it, grave enough to justify the interference of the law. They proposed that a person should be deemed to be a molester or obstructor of another person in any of the following cases:—if he persistently followed such person about from place to place; if he hid the tools used by such person; if he, with two or more other persons, watched or beset the house or other place where such person resided, or worked, or happened to be; or if he followed such person persistently about the street. But these things were not to be sufficient to constitute the offence, unless it were proved that the object were to coerce the workman for the purpose of inducing him to leave his employment, or not to accept employment, or to induce masters to alter the number or the description of the persons they employed, or to prevent the doing of some other lawful act. So far with respect to the alteration of the Act of George IV. As regarded the removal of the legal disabilities of trades unions, one object of this Bill, as he had just stated, was to remove these disabilities so far as regarded contracts entered into by trades unions with third parties. At present, trades unions were wholly illegal; and, being so, every agreement, however innocent in itself, was tainted with illegality. The Bill did not propose to legalize what might be called primary contracts—such as agreements not to work or not to employ—and no person will be entitled to sue for benefits to which he is entitled under a contract with a trade union. If such contracts were enforceable, our Courts of Equity might be called upon to enjoin masters against opening their works, or workmen from going to work, or discontinuing a strike; whilst our County Courts would have to make decrees for contributions to strikes, or to enforce penalties from workmen who had felt it their duty to resume employment. It was not proposed to place trades unions, therefore, in all respects on the same footing as friendly societies. It was not the opinion of Mr. Harrison, who so ably represented the trades unions on the Commission, that the law should be altered to that extent. Mr. Harrison had stated so clearly the reasons for that opinion that he could not do better than quote his words—

of regulation possible in the case of the latter is not possible in the case of the former. All questions of crime apart, the objects at which they aim, the rights which they claim, and the liabilities which they incur are for the most part, it seems to us, such as Courts of Law should neither enforce, nor modify, nor annul. They should rest entirely on consent."

It was in accordance with that opinion that the measure of the Government had been framed. With respect to registration the recommendation of the Commission was that the rules and accounts of these societies ought to be made public. The Bill, however, made registration optional; but it afforded particular advantages to such societies as registered themselves and published their accounts. Those societies would have remedies similar to those of friendly societies—that is to say, summary means of prosecuting those who might defraud them of their property, or retain it in their possession. The societies, on the other hand, which should not register themselves and publish their accounts would have to avail themselves of the more circuitous mode of redress afforded by the Act passed by the right hon. Gentleman the Recorder of London in 1868. He did not think there would be any objection on the part of trades unions in general to register themselves. Such were the general provisions of the Bill. The question of trades unions was one of extreme difficulty in its bearings on society. The objects which those unions had in view were on the one side regarded with the greatest interest and favour, and on the other they were viewed with great dislike and alarm. No doubt some of the regulations made by trades unions were very objectionable; but there were others which involved principles of the greatest importance to the working classes, for watching over whose interests they were originally created. In general they were friendly societies, and something more, and that something more seemed to him one of the most valuable parts of the institution. If hon. Gentlemen would read the evidence taken before the Commissioners as to the proceedings of the Engineers, for example, they would find that one of the principal duties and employments of the union was to watch over the interests of their fellow-workmen, to find out where the demand for labour was plentiful and where it was deficient, and to give information and so to provide for its distribution. Now, when hon. Gentlemen considered the great hardships which working men suffered without any fault of their own; the terrible fluctuations of trade to which they were subject; how the introduction of machinery, which went so far to cheapen commodities and confer great benefits on society, often had the immediate effect of inflicting grievous injury upon them, it must be admitted that any institution which had for its object the removal, or, at all events, the diminution of those evils, the distribution of labour where labour was required, and the relief of men suffering from want of employment, was worthy of the respect and sympathy of that House. He had been struck by the hardships to which workmen were often reduced from the fluctuations of trade. Over and over again men had been brought before him, and no doubt before other hon. Gentlemen, charged with having left their wives and children on the parish; and their defence was that they had been out of work for weeks, that they gone to some place where they had heard there was a demand for labour, that their resources were exhausted before they left home, and the consequence was that their wives and children had become chargeable. Assuredly, then, an institution which furnished men with the means of seeking labour where labour was in demand was one which deserved some consideration at the hands of the Legislature, and was worthy of their respect and support. He had admitted that there were other regulations of the unions which were not so susceptible of defence—such as those which interfered with the labour of children, which prevented the employment of certain persons, or dictated the terms on which they should be employed. Rules which limited the number of apprentices in one trade could not but have the effect of overcrowding others, and the general suffering was thus increased. But the question was, whether these were matters for interference by means of penal laws? Were they not really points which in the long run must be settled between the employers and the employed? Had not all the penal legislation on this subject proved utterly ineffectual to eradicate economical fallacies, or to prevent efforts being made to give them practical application? When Sir Robert Peel introduced the Act of 1825 he foresaw that it might be a failure—he knew that it dealt only with a superficial part of the subject, and that all the causes of disagreement between the masters and workmen still remained in force. On that occasion he used these words—

“In such cases, all that he could do was to advise the masters to enter into counter-combinations, by which they might succeed in defeating the objects of the men. That they might succeed by such counter-combination there could be no question; but, then, the feeling of amicability and good faith, which ought to exist between masters and men, would be destroyed; and he therefore gave such advice with the utmost reluctance, because he felt that by establishing these counter-combinations the amount of evil was only increased; and yet, without them, the masters, under the present system, could have no protection.”

It appeared, therefore, that Sir Robert Peel contemplated a state of chronic warfare between masters and workmen as the only resource, should the Act which he introduced fail in repressing the mischief it was devised to remedy. But the failure of the law to remove the evils which flowed from the discussions between masters and workmen had suggested other and more promising means for securing a peaceable solution. The system of voluntary arbitration was rapidly spreading, and commending itself to the adoption of both parties. He felt bound to add, that if the efforts of such men as his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes), Mr. Rupert Kettle, Mr. David Dale, and others who took an active part in the question, should result in putting an end to those evils, they deserved to be regarded as among the greatest benefactors of mankind. Disputes between master and servant, such as those which he had described, did not cease in their effects with the moment. He had known men who had for years suffered from the consequences of having joined in strikes, employers were ruined or impoverished, and the sources of further employment thus dried up. It was not, however, he was afraid, by means of penal enactments that such a state of things was to be terminated. It was rather by making the law neutral between both parties; by taking care that it should in all respects be just and equal; by promoting in every possible manner a good understanding between them; and by leading them to arrange, so far as that could be done, their disputes among one another rather by force of reason than by force of law. Such was the object which was sought to be attained by the present Bill, which would, he believed, be hailed with as much satisfaction by the employers of labour as by the workmen. The former did not, he was sure, wish to subject the latter to unjust treatment; nor was it to the law, he believed, they looked for protection or for a career of future prosperity. They desired rather to be regarded by those whom they employed with confidence; to be served with a cheerfulness which could only exist when the law was just in its operation, and when there existed between themselves and their workmen that thorough understanding and mutual interest which would be so conducive to the benefit of both. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. T. HUGHES expressed his cordial thanks to his right hon. Friend for having introduced the Bill. He sympathized entirely with him in his introductory remarks as to the time which it had taken to bring the question into its present position. As it happened, it was this month 20 years that he himself had first gone with a deputation to a predecessor in Office of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject; and since that time no year had, he believed, passed without an application in connection with it having been made to the Home Department. He was glad to find that the Bill of the Government would deal with the whole question, and that in a manner likely to be satisfactory to both employers and employed. The Bill had, in his opinion, many recommendations—some of them of a negative character. It made, for instance, no attempt whatever to separate the funds of trades union societies into those subscribed for trade and those subscribed for other purposes. To make such an attempt would, he was convinced, be fatal to any measure, and would not be accepted by the unions, whatever benefits the Bill might confer in other directions. The Bill was also good in so far as it did not seek to limit the freedom of the men in following their own interests by combining, so long as they kept within the law. As to the affirmative side of the measure, it contained, if he understood it rightly, a great many provisions which he should like to see in operation. It secured entire protection to the funds of trades unions, and gave to those societies such a legal status as would place them in the position which they ought to hold in the country as powerful and well-organized societies. He was happy to find that his right hon. Friend had adopted the suggestion of combining with the boon of registration the necessity of publicity, for the more these societies could be brought under the eye of the public the less fear of them would be entertained. It gave him, further, great satisfaction to perceive that the Bill would sweep away the old statute of George IV., which had been very properly designated as a solemn duelling code between the employers and the men, while it was drawn up entirely in the interests of one side. His satisfaction, however, had been somewhat diminished on hearing his right hon. Friend state that it was intended to revive a portion of that Act, which had been the cause of much mischief in times past. He referred to the two offences which were created by the statute of George IV., and for which penal sentences for three months were inflicted. Those offences, which were new to our statute as well as to our common law, were what were known as molestation and obstruction; and since the passing of the Act the offences which came under those heads had been visited severely in numberless cases on the working classes, while there was not a single instance in which an employer had been convicted. The words had continued to be a bone of contention throughout, and he thought it would have been much better if his right hon. Friend had confined the penal clauses in his Bill to intimidation and threats of violence, and had left out the words molestation and obstruction, which it was, he believed, impossible for his right hon. Friend or anybody else to define. As it was, he feared a recurrence of such cases as that of "Reg. v. Hinchcliff," in which four months' imprisonment were inflicted on several men for crying "Baa! baa! black sheep!" when some men who had gone to work were passing in the street. With that exception he looked on the Bill with the most cordial approval, and he hoped the Government would be able to add it to the great measures of the last two Sessions.

MR. HERMON congratulated the Government on having been able to lay the Bill on the Table at so early a period of the Session; and, while anxious that there should be no delay in taking the second reading, trusted sufficient time would be given both to employers and workmen to make themselves acquainted with its details before that stage arrived, and thus rendering more probable a settlement which would be satisfactory and final. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill would operate with perfect justice as between the master and the men. If this measure accomplished the objects which it aimed at, it would be looked upon as one of the greatest boons which this country had received; and, in saying this, he spoke for the employer as much as for the workmen themselves, for nothing could be more detrimental to the prosperity of trade than continual outbreaks occurring with respect to one or other of its branches. It was his happy lot never to have received notice of a strike from his own people, and he trusted that the operation of this Bill would bring about that confidence between employer and employed that would enable them in future so to determine questions of wages as to avoid those serious periodical collisions which brought destruction to the peace and happiness of the homes of the poor and disturbance of all comfort and happiness on the part of those who employed them. Taken in connection with the Education Bill, which the Vice President of the Council had the good fortune to pass last year, he believed the effect of this measure would be greatly to enlighten the working population of the kingdom, and he trusted that the joint operation of these two Acts would put far away for the future the sad experience of former times.

MR. MUNDELLA also begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for having brought in this measure at the earliest possible moment, and thereby afforded a fair opportunity of legislating upon a subject which it had been impossible to take up during the last two Sessions. He expressed a hope that it would be found to contain nothing vague or exceptional with regard to acts which were construed into offences under the terms "molestation" and "obstruction" by the Act of George IV.; but, on the contrary, that it would do its work thoroughly and remove the bitterness which had existed for 50 years. From his intimate acquaintance with trade unions he was aware, of course, that there was a great deal about them which was coarse and objectionable; but when the Report of the Truck Commission was produced, it would be found how much misery, oppression, and injustice existed in places where there were no trade unions. There was another feature in connection with them—that they afforded the only machinery for getting at the workmen of any trade en masse with a view to arbitration and conciliation. As an instance of what could be accomplished in this way, he mentioned that the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes), by his labours in a court of arbitration, within the last few days, had settled the question of wages in a town formerly torn by strikes to the entire satisfaction of both masters and workmen until March, 1872. The countries both of Europe and on the other side of the Atlantic were looking to England to devise the means of bringing about a good understanding between employers and employed. In this matter we were in advance of other countries, for they had still their troubles to go through, while we had nearly come to the end of ours.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL BILL.—LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal an Act for preventing the assumption of certain Ecclesiastical Titles in respect of places in the United Kingdom, said, as the Bill was substantially the same as that of last year, he would postpone any remarks which he might have to make until the second reading.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed that the Bill was not discussed last year until the 5th of August, and during the discussion there were never 150 Members present. It might be useful that he should advert to the history of this proposal. In 1867 the House appointed a Committee, which sat during the greater part of the Session on the subject of the Bill now introduced, and reported in favour of the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act by a majority of one. In 1868 the House of Lords appointed a Committee to consider the same proposal, and the Committee reported against the repeal. Early last Session a Member of the Government (the Earl of Kimberley) introduced a Bill into the House of Lords. The second reading was strongly objected to, and in Committee the first clause, which contained the principle of the Bill, was essentially altered. In that state the Bill reached the House of Commons, and was not debated or considered in any way until nearly the end of the Session. The second reading was then carried by the Government, and in Committee they introduced the very clause which the House of Lords had struck out. Several other Amendments were proposed, which the Government rejected, and the Bill was sent back to the Lords; where it was dropped. If the Bill was the same as that of last Session, it dealt with two different subjects. First with the disability created under the Irish Church Act of the Session before last, whereby the successors of the present Bishops of the disestablished Church would be forbidden to call themselves by the titles of the sees of those whom they will have succeeded, these titles having been originally conferred by the authority of the Crown. The other object of the Bill was far more objectionable, for it would sanction the assumption of territorial titles by the nominees of his Holiness the Pope. Now, considering what had passed in the Œcumenical Council, which had become fully known since the sitting of that council, he believed that, if at a former period the Bill was justly held to be inappropriate, it would be found to have become still more inappropriate now.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to repeal an Act for preventing the assumption of certain Ecclesiastical Titles in respect of places in the United Kingdom, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. GLADSTONE, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 27.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MUNTZ, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to exempt Charities and Hospitals from Local Rates, said, he did not wish to enact any new or to repeal any existing law, his only object being to re-enact a statute of the 43rd year of Queen Elizabeth, which had always been supposed to exempt charities, until one of its provisions had been set aside by the decision of a Court of Law about three years ago. According to that decision charities supported by voluntary contributions were liable to be assessed to the poor rate. Great difficulties had resulted from this decision; and not very long ago distraints were issued against a charitable institution of the kind referred to, and even beds on which sick and infirm persons were lying were seized for poor rates. He might mention that when the Irish Poor Law Act was passed a special clause was inserted in it, providing that charitable institutions supported by voluntary contributions should be exempted from rates. Some persons thought a great principle was involved in this matter, and that it would be unfair to the taxpayers if all the property in a parish were not rated. He had, therefore, made the present measure different from that of last year in this respect, that it be left to the vestry and overseers to determine whether a charitable institution should be rated or not. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to exempt Charities and Hospitals from Local Rates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MUNTZ, Viscount SANDON, and Mr. WHEELHOUSE.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to Inclosures of Commons, and to provide for the management of Commons situate near Towns, said, that in most respects it was the same as the Bill which was introduced last year by his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, but which, like so many other Bills, failed because its passage was blocked by other business. That Bill was founded on the Report of a Committee moved for in the previous Session by his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) in consequence of numerous complaints being made that in recent inclosures the rights of the public and of the labouring poor had not been sufficiently considered. He would not now enter into a disquisition on the law of commons. It was sufficient to remark that the commons, which formerly formed so essential a feature of rural life, were lands which have remained open from time immemorial in consequence of numerous rights possessed by the inhabitants—such as turning out cattle and digging turf. It was also clear that, except under very special circumstances, inclosures could not be effected without the sanction of Parliament, and Parliament had either refused or given that sanction according to whether it would benefit the public or the reverse. The Inclosure Act of 1845 was passed with the double object of facilitating the inclosure of these lands which were better suited for cultivation, and of providing that the interests of the public and of the labouring poor should be more carefully looked after than they had been up to that time. In the Report of the Select Committee appointed in 1843 it was stated that in the inclosures which had been affected for many years prior to that date the interests of the public had been systematically disregarded. Now, the Act of 1845 instructed the Inclosure Commissioners, in the first place, to decide on the general expediency of each inclosure, and if they deemed it expedient they were to set apart a certain portion of the land, defined by the Act, for the purposes of recreation, while another portion was to be converted into allotments for the labouring poor. Since 1845 about 500,000 acres of commons had been inclosed under that Act, of which 364,000 acres were subject to common rights, and 3,671 acres had been allotted to the labouring poor. The Committee which sat two years ago was of opinion that the Act of 1845 was of too restrictive a character, and recommended various amendments to be made in it. Now, as regards the commons in agricultural districts, the Government were of opinion that no obstacle should be placed in the way of their inclosure; but that when they were inclosed the interests of the public and the labouring poor should be regarded in a more liberal spirit than heretofore. It was found very difficult, however, to lay down any general rule with regard to recreation grounds and allotments. The rules in the existing Act had, to a certain extent, failed already; and it was extremely difficult to frame any rule which would not be unequal and arbitrary. It was thought better, therefore, to require that a certain proportion should be allotted in all cases. By the present Bill he proposed to enact that one-tenth should be appropriated, according to the discretion of the Commissioners, either to public recreation or as allotments for the labouring poor. Last Session, however, he found that considerable opposition was raised to this proposal on the ground that, in some parts of Wales, where the commons consisted mainly of mountain lands which were not generally appropriate for allotments, as much as one-tenth were required to be thus appropriated, all inclosures would be practically put an end to. In the present Bill, therefore, he proposed to make this restriction—that the amount so allotted should in no case exceed 50 acres. With regard to the quantity of land likely to become subject to inclosure or to be converted into allotments, no certain data were procurable; but from estimates made in 1845 it appeared that about 8,000,000 acres of land in this country were unenclosed and subject to common rights. Since then about 500,000 acres have been inclosed—that would leave about 7,500,000 acres at the present time; but it should be borne in mind that a considerable proportion of this was situate in the mountainous districts of Wales, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. Still there was in the cultivated districts a considerable quantity of land which might be enclosed. The estimate was that from 25 to 30 per cent of the land in the mountainous districts was uninclosed, and about 11 per cent in the cultivated districts. When those lands were in the vicinity of large towns there was a general feeling that it was desirable to leave them open instead of subjecting them to inclosure and cultivation. Consequently, the Bill of last year provided that where it was proposed to inclose commons in the neighbourhood of large towns, the Inclosure Commissioners should not act except with the consent of the local authorities. At the same time, his right hon. Friend the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple) brought in a Bill to extend the operation of the Metropolitan Commons Act of 1866 to the commons in the neighbourhood of all large towns, to prohibit the Commissioners from entertaining any proposal for the inclosure of lands within a certain distance from large towns, to provide for their better management, and for the prevention of nuisances upon them. That measure passed the second reading by a considerable majority, and most of its provisions were incorporated in the Bill which he now asked for leave to introduce. The chief objection to the right hon. Gentleman's Bill was that it had reference not merely to commons in the neighbourhood of large towns, but also to commons of which only a very small portion might be within the proposed limits. An example of these might be found in the large common known as Cannock Chase. The limits within which it was proposed by the Bill that inclosures should not be made were one mile from the centre of a town of 5,000 inhabitants up to five miles from a town of 100,000 inhabitants. There would be no invasion of rights already possessed, but simply a restriction of the facilities for inclosure which had been granted by Parliament in the belief that inclosure was to the interest of the public. Now that Parliament had come to an opposite conclusion, it would simply withdraw the facilities it had granted, and would direct the Commissioners not to entertain applications for inclosure within those limits. With regard to commons near large towns, means were taken to provide for their improvement and the abatement of nuisances. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he was sorry the Government had not gone more boldly to the task. Any restrictions to be placed on the facilities for inclosure recklessly granted by Parliament in bygone years would be welcomed, for those facilities were given not for the protection of existing rights, but for the acquiring of new ones at the expense of the public. The process of inclosure was one which, sooner or later, must come to an end; it was one in which generations to come were interested, but in which they would find they had no voice.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, although there might have been instances in which the public had suffered by inclosure it should be remembered that it was very desirable that waste land should be brought under cultivation. The bringing wild and common land into agriculture was of advantage equally to the labourer to whom it gave employment, and to the public who derived an increased amount of food. The distinction in this measure between rural and suburban commons made it an improvement upon the Bills of the last two Sessions.

MR. FAWCETT said, it could easily be proved that reckless inclosure was one cause of the unsatisfactory condition of our rural population. Up to this Session successive Governments had treated the subject with contempt, and any effort to prevent the passing of Inclosure Bills was regarded almost as unparliamentary. Two years ago, when it was proposed to enclose 6,900 acres, only six were reserved for the poor; and yet it was necessary to resort to all forms of Parliamentary procedure to impede the progress of such a Bill, and it was with the utmost difficulty that it was prevented from passing into law. The hon. Member in charge of this Bill would certainly do as much for the poor and the public as his Colleagues would permit him to do. In some cases the allotment for the poor ought to be more than a tenth, and therefore, after the passing of the Bill, watchfulness would still be required to see that the public did not suffer through the adoption of an arbitrary line.

MR. MACFIE said, that six miles from Birkenhead there was a hill which commanded a fine view of the estuaries of the Mersey and the Dee, and from which the Isle of Man could be seen; this hill had been inclosed because the local inquiry was confined to the spot, whereas those who suffered by the inclosure were the people living within a radius of half-a-dozen miles. Nor had care been taken to preserve the pathways that were open for Saturday afternoon walks.

MR. WHITWELL pointed out that great care ought to be taken to preserve footpaths and rights of way over the mountainous districts of Wales and the North of England, or great loss and inconvenience might arise to the inhabitants, and hon. Members might find their autumnal enjoyment interfered with.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the Bill provided for the cases just named, and greatly increased the powers of the Commissioners in respect of roads and footpaths across places proposed to be enclosed. Power was also given to allow anyone who wished to do so to leave his allotment open to the public. In no case would the allotment for the recreation of the poor exceed 50 acres.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in moving that the Bill be read a second time upon this day six months, said, that, considering the frequent discussions which had taken place on the subject, and that every argument on either side of the question had been exhausted, he should not deem himself justified in detaining the House more than one or two minutes. He regretted that some hon. Gentleman who had taken a more prominent part in their discussions on this question had not given Notice of an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers). Feeling, however, strongly on the subject, and knowing that a great many hon. Members concurred in opinion with him, that a measure of this great importance should not be allowed to pass sub silentio, he no longer hesitated to place upon the Paper his Notice of Amendment. Having given this brief explanation, he felt that he should be studying the feelings of hon. Members on both sides of the House by simply moving the rejection of the measure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that though he did not intend to take part in the discussion on this question, he considered that it would be not acting respectfully either to the supporters or opponents of the measure if the House were to come suddenly and unpreparedly to a division upon it. Inasmuch as an important meeting was announced for to-morrow on the subject, he was in hopes that the hon. Baronet would have been induced to take the wiser and more respectful course of deferring his opposition to the Bill, until, at all events, the result of such meeting was ascertained. Notwithstanding, however, the hasty opposition of the hon. Baronet, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was still not without hopes that, considering the frequent decisions of that House upon the question and its present aspect, those hon. Gentlemen who had hitherto opposed this relaxation of a vexatious restriction would come to the conclusion that they had fought long enough against a relaxation which had over and over again been carried in that House, and which had been carried by a larger majority than ever in a Parliament elected by household suffrage. Every argument for and against the Bill had frequently been adduced; but when he considered that the question was looked upon with great interest by a large body of hon. Members and a very large party in the country, he could not but feel that it would be wrong that the second reading of the Bill should be taken without even the slightest discussion. No doubt it was a very serious thing to alter the marriage laws of the country. He could quite appreciate and understand the feeling of those who urged that view; but the proposition before the House was not a hasty, sudden, or ill-considered alteration of those laws, but an alteration which had frequently been pressed upon their attention, which had the support of a very large number both of clergy and laity, and which was regarded with great anxiety by a considerable portion of the community. The Bill was not likely to be a subject for popular agitation. The sufferers under the present system were not so numerous or so influential as to command a popular agitation, and that which, under other circumstances, would have been deemed tyrannous, might still longer be endured without that agitation to which he had alluded. That there should have been wrong done to even one person in this country was, however, a subject worthy of the consideration of the House; but in this case wrong had been done to a large number of persons. Here were certain marriages, the contractors of which were received in society, and were not considered in any respect as having done anything unlawful, although they might be considered by certain religious communities to have offended against the laws of those communities. The question was whether, because a man did that which was legal in many other counties, and which was regarded as no offence against the social law of his country, there should remain upon the statute book a law which inflicted upon him as cruel a punishment as could be inflicted. He himself knew of individuals having gone abroad to other countries where these marriages were allowed to be contracted, and having contracted them in the belief that they would be held legal in this country. They were persons of good station in life, and above any suspicion of immorality; and although they had taken every precaution to fulfil the law by a decision given in the Courts of Law a few years ago, their issue had been bastardized and the marriage declared null. The burden did not rest upon persons in the upper and middle classes of society. Although he objected to the use of cant phrases in that House, yet it could not be denied that this was a "poor man's question," and one which, as such, ought to be dealt with carefully and tenderly. He had been told that the women of England were against the granting of this relaxation of the law of marriage, and no doubt where the influence of persons in Holy Orders had been brought to bear the feeling of the female population was against it. He did not believe, however, that the women were at all so unanimously opposed to the Bill as was generally imagined. It had been urged that if these marriages were allowed the unmarried sister of the wife would be placed at a great disadvantage, and under circumstances of suspicion, and that, in fact, she would not be asked to stay in the house of her married sister because there would be a suspicion around her, and that jealousy would arise, and the happiness of homes be interfered with. That was simply a libel upon the women of England. He believed that a woman who would be jealous of the sister to whom her husband might be married after her decease would be equally jealous of her under existing circumstances. He did not believe that, in this respect, this alteration would make the slightest difference among the working classes, where these marriages were very frequent. He knew it to be the case that in many instances the wife on her death-bed asked her husband to marry her sister, and to take that sister as a stepmother to his children in preference to any other woman. It was not an unnatural conclusion that that stepmother would be more inclined to love the children than any other woman would. He had known many curious instances of hardship occurring from the existing state of the law. In one instance a yeoman, dying, left his farm to his three daughters jointly whilst unmarried. Two of the sisters married, and one of them dying, her husband married the third sister, who refused to give up the farm when called upon to do so, on the ground that although she was married the marriage was illegal. That, of course, was only one of the many ridiculous circumstances created by the present law. He looked upon this question as a Churchman, and he believed that it was an injury to the Church of England to have this restriction preserved. He felt that, living in a country where religious freedom was boasted of, the Church of England would act harshly and ill-advisedly in endeavouring to force its restrictions on those who were not members of her communion. The canon laws of the Church were talked of, but if a poor man who was asked by his wife on her death-bed to take her sister after her decease were talked to about the canon laws, he would reply that there was something far higher, and, unless he were shown something more valid than a relic of ecclesiastical tyranny, he would not be bound by the canon law. This relaxation of the law had been asked for by many thousands of the people, and it had been pressed upon the attention of the Legislature over and over again. He did not say that there might not be other restrictions which might be removed; but this was a great grievance, and minor grievances would not be prevented from being brought forward by refusing to redress that which was an undeniable grievance. By granting this relaxation the House would be granting a great boon to the country. It was a question of civil and religious liberty which was deeply infringed by imposing upon the people of England a restriction which was not justified by common sense, by reason, or by the will of the people, whilst it was not imposed by other countries, and was contrary to the convictions of many of the clergy and laity and against the unanimous feeling of all the Nonconformist bodies in the country. He would not touch upon the religious part of the question, for whatever opinions a man might hold on religious subjects he had no right to force them down the throats of other people. The Church of England existed by the good-will of the people, and that good-will would not be strengthened by the continuance of this restriction. It was a significant fact that it was by the votes of the Bishops that the Bill had previously been prevented from becoming law. The whole subject had been frequently argued, and the arguments appeared to be so overwhelming in favour of the Bill that he thought the House would sincerely and heartily vote for it.

Mr. MONK said, he did not rise for the purpose of prolonging any debate upon this well-worn subject. He had great doubts whether the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had adopted a wise and judicious course in moving the Amendment. The House having on several occasions, by large majorities, expressed its determination that this Bill should become law, he (Mr. Monk), for one, thought that any further opposition in that House was both useless and injudicious.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

Whilst saying that, he might observe that his sentiments upon the question had undergone no change. He believed, in unison with many hon. Members, that the removal of the restrictions asked for would tend to sap the foundations of society, and interrupt the social intercourse which now so happily existed in the most intimate family relations. He could not, however, shut his eyes to the fact that the measure was largely demanded out-of-doors. He had on different occasions strenuously opposed the Bill; but he had done so fairly, and on Motions for Adjournment he had generally voted with the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers). The time had now come when it ought no longer to be opposed in the House of Commons, and if the battle was to be fought at all, as he hoped it would be, it should be in "another place." He, however, appealed to the Government to bring in a far more comprehensive Bill than that before the House; one embracing the whole law of marriage, so as to touch more than one degree of affinity, in accordance with the Report of the Royal Commission to which the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) drew attention as long ago as 1869, and at that time elicited a promise from the Secretary of State for the Home Department that the Report should receive the attention of the Government with the view to legislation at an early period. He was not surprised at the omission of the subject from the Royal Speech at the commencement of the Session of 1870, seeing the business it was proposed to dispose of; but he was surprised to find it was not mentioned in the Speech delivered at the commencement of the present Session. The measure under consideration was exceptional, whereas the Royal Commissioners recommended uniformity; and he earnestly urged the Government to use their influence to set this measure aside, and to pledge themselves to introduce a comprehensive measure on an early day to establish a general law of marriage for the three kingdoms.

MR. CAMPBELL said, it was not his intention to ask the House to listen to any lengthened remarks, because he agreed that the subject had been pretty well exhausted in the two last Sessions; but he wished to remove what he believed to be a misapprehension as to the state of feeling in Scotland on the question. There was a general impression in and out of the House that the Scotch people entertained a feeling of great repugnance to the change, and were entirely opposed to the Bill; and so strong was that feeling that Notices had been put on the Paper, on previous occasions, of Amendments to except Scotland from the operation of the measure. Now, he believed that that was an entirely mistaken notion. There was no doubt—and he allowed that at once—that many years ago there was a strong feeling of opposition to this reform of the law in Scotland, but every year that feeling had become weaker and weaker, and now it was confined—so far as he could make out—to ecclesiastical circles; and when they went beyond the atmosphere of Kirk Sessions and Presbyteries there was a general feeling—he did not say enthusiastic desire—on the part of the people of Scotland to accept that change. Of course that was not very easy to prove or disprove; but he would produce two facts to substantiate the statement he had made. His first was that there were several Members of Parliament who had supported the Bill consistently during the last two Sessions, and since doing so they had visited their constituencies, and he had not heard that there was any whisper against their conduct in connection with the matter. He himself was certainly not taken to task for it, and, so far as he could gather from the newspaper reports, neither were any of the others. Another fact was this—he had taken the trouble of going over the Petitions presented to that House with regard to the Bill. He did not mean the Petitions presented in favour of it, for they knew how such Petitions were sometimes got up, and he did not regard them as a very certain index of public opinion; but taking the Petitions presented against the Bill, he found that in 1869 there were 209—of which no fewer than 118 came from Scotland. Now, that was rather a startling fact; but when he came to analyse those Petitions, it appeared that no less than 116 out of the 118 came from Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, General Assemblies, and other bodies of that kind, and there were only two Petitions which represented the general feeling of the people of Scotland. One of those Petitions came from Irvine, with 52 signatures, and the other under the somewhat pretentious title of "the Petition of Noblemen and others of Scotland," was signed by 115. Last year he found the total number of Petitions against the Bill was 56, of which 53 came from Scotland, and 49 out of these were from Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, and so forth. Another came from a small parish, and had only 22 signatures. There was another from the Scottish Branch of the Marriage Law Defence Association. Then there was one from Rothesay, and another from the Town Council of Edinburgh. The Petition from the city of Edinburgh rather surprised him, but any conclusion founded upon that Petition might be modified when he said there was a counter-Petition sent from the numerical majority of the Town Council stating that the former Petition was smuggled through when there was only a small attendance. There was this further somewhat significant fact, that, out of a total of 171 Petitions from Scotland, 165 of which were ecclesiastical Petitions, 103 came from the Free Church of Scotland. He did not disparage the authority of those bodies, and did not wish to undervalue the weight of their influence in Scotland, or say one word against their raising their voice on any subject they thought fit; but the view they took of such a question—without speaking disrespectfully—was somewhat narrow, technical, and professional, and this was not the political view. The Scriptural argument was pretty generally given up, and it must be remembered they were not there as the governing body of a religious community, laying down rules for the guidance and discipline of its members, but as a civil Legislature, determining what was best and most expedient for society and for the State. That made all the difference. It would still be in the power of those bodies to restrain their followers from contracting those marriages, even should the Bill be passed; but he hoped the House would cease to interfere with the liberty of any man or woman to contract what marriage they pleased so long as they did nothing to disturb society. For those reasons, and acting as he believed consistently with his position as a Scotch Member, he should feel it his duty to support the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Campbell

MR. ORR EWING said, had it not been for the remarks that had just fallen from the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell), he should have given a silent vote against the Bill; but, as it was, he must trouble the House with one or two observations. He was very much afraid that since that hon. Gentleman had ceased to live north of the Tweed he had lost some of those good Scotch opinions which he used to entertain in his youth. He was afraid, also, that he was rather ignorant of the real state of feeling among his countrymen upon the question. He ventured to call the attention of the House to one fact in vindication of his contradiction of the assertion the hon. Gentleman had made with reference to the feeling of the Scotch people. They all knew that the people of Scotland were divided in religious matters into several sects; but they knew also that by far the greater portion were Presbyterians, belonging either to the Church of Scotland or to the Free Church of Scotland; and that they might be said truly to represent the feeling of the Scotch people. They had found that Petitions had been numerous and unanimously passed in the General Assemblies of both those Churches over and over again. The hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs had referred to the Petitions from Scotland, which constituted by far the larger number of Petitions that had been sent in against the Bill, as being of no significance, because they had been agreed to by Kirk Sessions and Presbyteries. He would, on the other hand, remind the House of what was the constitution of those bodies. It ought to be remembered that the Kirk Sessions were composed almost entirely of laymen. In every Kirk Session there were 12 laymen to one clergyman; and he thought that a stronger proof of the feeling of Scotchmen on the question could not be given than the fact that those Kirk Sessions had petitioned against the Bill. The real fact was that the people of Scotland trusted to those matters being looked after by the Kirk Sessions and the Presbyteries. Consequently, upon this question they had been satisfied by having those Petitions presented by those bodies, knowing very well that they fully represented the feeling of Scotland generally. He had merely said that for the purpose of contradicting the statement made by his hon. Friend—a statement which he considered to be totally at variance with the real facts of the case as regarded the Bill.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had hitherto abstained from speaking on the subject. His objection to the Bill was not based on religious but on social grounds, because during a long life he had had unfortunate opportunities of seeing the results of such a law as that which was now proposed to be sanctioned. He could confirm the statement of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that the Kirk Sessions of Scotland were not absolutely ecclesiastical, but were composed of leaders from the people, and nine-tenths of them were laymen. Therefore, those 165 Petitions were the expression of the people, and not merely of the clergy. The clergy were not the majority in any Church, whether Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or Free. The people of Scotland generally were opposed to the Bill, and therefore he should not support it.

MR. MORLEY said, that all the supporters of the Bill claimed was freedom for those who believed that marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not repugnant to religion or morality. In thousands of cases it was the most natural marriage a man could contract. He was quite in a condition to say, from his knowledge of the working classes, that in consequence of the restriction imposed by the existing law, concubinage was extending amongst them, and that they were losing their regard for the sacredness of the law of marriage. Some mode of settling the question should be discovered, for the present law led to bad results. The ecclesiastical authorities had given up the Bible argument against the proposed change. A large number of Bishops, the clergy of the Established Church, the Roman hierarchy, and the Jewish Rabbis had given expression to their conviction that these marriages were not contrary to the law of God, and it was a fact that they were sanctioned in every country in the world except Great Britain and two or three of the Colonies. The House of Commons had repeatedly passed the Bill, and he trusted it would now give its usual imprimatur in favour of an alteration of the law. He should, at all events, join the hon. and learned Gentleman in sending the Bill to "another place," in the hope that it would at last receive there the only treatment it ought to receive.

MR. T. CHAMBERS stated that, having withdrawn the Bill in 1869 late in July, he had introduced it again in 1870, and at the earnest request of the Opposition he had postponed the second reading until after Easter to allow of full discussion. At the close of that full discussion a large majority, for the fortieth time, sanctioned the provisions of the Bill. This year he had introduced the measure at the earliest possible moment, and, fortunately, for those who desired discussion he had secured the first place on the first Wednesday of the Session for the second reading. Thinking it unnecessary to weary the House with arguments which had been repeated until there were none to reply to them, he had simply moved the second reading; but surely something more was expected of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who had succeeded to the post assumed by a long line of hon. Members, beginning with Mr. Goulburn and Sir Robert Inglis, and coming down to the representatives of Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope and Mr. S. Walpole). His predecessors had thought it due to the House to offer some reasons for the opposition they made; but the hon. Baronet thought it becoming to move the rejection of the Bill in half-a-dozen sentences. Of course, the hon. Baronet hoped to snatch a division that would have enabled an aristocratic assembly at Willis's Rooms to-morrow, presided over by the young heir to an old dukedom, to flatter themselves and blind the public by an apparent shifting of opinion in the House of Commons. Accordingly, the hon. Baronet had refrained from delivering the speech he had taken weeks to prepare, in the hopes of procuring a reduced majority at half-past 12. But he could assure the hon. Baronet that a trick never answered but for a short time; and he had no doubt that, notwithstanding the self-denial of the hon. Baronet in keeping his speech in his pocket, the speakers at Willis's Rooms would not be able to grow eloquent on a reduced majority, a vacillating House of Commons, and a change in public opinion. It was difficult to speak in support of a measure against which no arguments had been urged; if the hon. Baronet would but let him have the notes of his speech he promised to answer every argument contained in them. The religious argument was wholly abandoned, and, indeed, he could not understand how it could have ever been brought forward after the passing of the Act of 1835. The social argument against it had also been abandoned. What Parliamentary precedent was there for such pertinacious opposition to the measure? [A laugh.] The hon. Baronet laughed; but there was no argument in a laugh, and not much courtesy in a laugh. For 20 years the House had passed this Bill; more than 40 divisions had been taken upon it, and five times it had gone up to the House of Lords. Surely this was a lesson to the House of Commons not to do in haste that which they might afterwards desire to undo. The Act of 1835 was a fraud upon the House, and it was only passed on the understanding that the mischief would be remedied early in the ensuing Session. That had never been done, and it was a lesson to the House never again to assent to a Bill to be remedied in the following Session, if, as experience showed them, it required 36 years to achieve that object. Every conceivable form of opposition had been adopted in that House to defeat the Bill, but hitherto without success, and he hoped the one adopted on that occasion would fail also. As regarded the argument that the law should not be made to differ in different parts of the Empire, he might remark that in some Colonies such marriages were allowed, in others void, and in others again voidable, while in several where they were not legal they would have been made so but for the Home Government, which interposed in order to prevent confusion in such matters. Five times over the Legislature of South Australia had sought Imperial sanction for the change in the law now proposed. In Western Australia and Canada the feeling was the same. The question affected the whole Empire, and he (Mr. T. Chambers) desired the establishment of uniformity in the law, which could only be secured by making the change which he proposed. In favour of that change there was, even in the House of Lords, an absolute majority of the hereditary Peers, and the whole kingdom was now waiting for the pleasure of four Bishops, who must stand entirely on the social objection, in which they were opposed by parochial clergymen of the greatest experience. From the time of Bishop Jewell down to the present day this question had been fought and argued out, and everything showed that the House of Commons was in the right. Moreover, he had a deep conviction that public feeling in Scotland was growing in favour of the Bill. On these grounds he contended that the Bill ought without delay to pass into law.

Mr. HINDE PALMER, in supporting the Motion, said, that was a subject on which there existed, no doubt, throughout the country a great diversity of opinion. His own conviction was that an overwhelming majority of the thinking portion of the community were in favour of that Bill, although that was no reason why those who were conscientiously opposed to it should be reproached for seeking on all legitimate occasions, if they chose, to have their views confirmed by the House. Uniformity was most desirable in the marriage law, and he trusted that before long the Government, acting on the Report of the Royal Commission on the subject, would bring in some measure for placing all the marriage law of this country upon one clear, definite, and certain basis. In any such measure he thought it would be well to incorporate the present Bill. He saw the prospect of "the religious difficulty" cropping up before them on various occasions; but it was satisfactory at least to feel that that difficulty had been got rid of in connection with that discussion. With regard to the moral and social aspects of the question—and these were the only grounds upon which the Bill was now opposed—he had the strongest conviction that the moral and social considerations were on the side of his hon. and learned Friend. It was a great mistake to suppose that the restriction now sought to be removed affected the better-off classes of society merely; it had a most pernicious operation on the working classes, and it was mainly on their account that he supported its removal. Our richer countrymen desirous of marrying their deceased wives' sisters could easily go to parts of Germany, where such marriages were perfectly legal, and satisfy their own consciences by having them duly solemnized; but poor men could not afford to go abroad for such a purpose, and, therefore, if they wished to contract a marriage of that kind, they were obliged to go on living in a state which our law stamped as concubinage. In this sense, therefore, the existing law operated unfairly as between class and class. It was urged that if they passed that Bill they would alter the whole social habits of families, and no wife's unmarried sister could live in free and familiar intercourse under the same roof with the husband and wife. That supposed effect of the measure was, he thought, enormously exaggerated; and the same objection might logically be pushed almost to the length of saying that they could have no unmarried young lady whatever living on familiar terms in the same house with a husband and wife. The objection was one of a conventional and overstrained character, and founded on the feelings of classes of society that were much more sensitive on such points than the working population generally. He maintained that the social and moral evils arising from the present state of the law far outweighed any likely to be created by the proposed change; and on every ground of policy, justice, domestic happiness and virtue he hoped the House would re-affirm the principle of that Bill. He fully admitted the right of the opponents of the measure to challenge the decision of the House upon it; but it was neither fair nor decent on so important a matter that a division should be taken in any way by surprise.

Mr. DENMAN said, that he did not suppose there had been any intention to take the House by surprise. According to the view entertained by certain hon. Gentlemen who had strong conscientious objections, they felt it to be their duty to take the sense of the House, in order to put upon record their dissent from the principle of the Bill; but undoubtedly had the hon. Member's Motion been put to the Chair at once, the result at so early a period of the day, when the House was thin, might have encouraged those who objected to the Bill, in "another place," to misunderstand the true feeling of the House in reference to the question. While admitting that the opponents of the measure had a perfect right to take a division at this stage without further discussion, he, and hon. Members in favour of the Bill, were, by the very silence of its opponents, entitled to say that the subject had now been thoroughly exhausted; and if proof were demanded of this fact, he had only to remind the House that, until the arrival of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy), who at that moment had become visible to his eyes, the front Opposition Bench was vacant. He would only add that if, as he supposed to be the case, it now appeared to be the feeling of hon. Members opposing the measure that this question must soon be finally settled by legalizing these marriages, it would be cruel to keep the question open longer, and to bastardize many children year after year.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 16th February, 1871.

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: Before my noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) rises to propose a Committee of Inquiry into the Board of Admiralty I must make an appeal to him as to the course he is about to pursue, and I trust your Lordships will agree that I have very good grounds for doing so. The noble Duke intends to propose "an inquiry into the present state of the Board with reference to recent changes in its constitution, and the practical working of the Department." Now, with all respect to the noble Duke, I submit that the present is not a fitting time for such a Motion. I am far indeed from saying that, under ordinary circumstances, such a subject would not very properly engage your Lordships' attention; but at the present moment, in the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty, neither I nor my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Camperdown), who is more conversant with the matter, feel that we possess sufficient knowledge of the opinions and views of the head of the Department to be able properly to discuss the question. It seems to me, too, that it is not an unreasonable request for us to make, that we should not be asked to consent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the Department of our absent Colleague, seeing that owing to illness he cannot be communicated with. If Mr. Childers had the opportunity of communicating his views to us, he might have furnished us with unanswerable reasons against the proposed inquiry, and during his absence from illness it would hardly be reasonable to ask us to agree to the Committee. Your Lordships may have seen, from correspondence which appeared in The Times this morning, that personal differences exist in the Admiralty as to questions of fact. There, again, though we have some information on the subject, the First Lord alone possesses the full and complete knowledge which would enable us, after communicating with him, to state his views or discuss the matter. I hope, therefore, the noble Duke will postpone his Motion. I do not think he will make any very great sacrifice in doing so. We have every reason to hope and expect that Mr. Childers will be at home in the course of next week—so that I do not ask for any long postponement. I may as well take the opportunity of stating exactly how the case stands with regard to Mr. Childers, because it is undeniable—and my Colleagues undoubtedly feel as much as any noble Lords opposite—that it is most unsatisfactory for the head of one of the great Departments of the State to be absent at the opening of the Session. I hope, however, that when I have stated the circumstances your Lordships will not think this position of affairs so unreasonable as might at first sight appear. Mr. Childers had a very severe illness in the course of last spring, but was able to resume his place in the House before the close of the Session. I believe that during the summer he had entirely recovered. But in the course of the autumn the catastrophe which shocked everybody in the country occurred. Painful as the sudden loss of the Captain was to all of us, it was still more painful to Mr. Childers as the head of the Department which sent the ship to sea, and still more from the personal loss he sustained by the death of his son, who had joined the ship a very short time before. This calamity bore very heavily on him. In the autumn he went through a great deal of work, the pressure of which, added to the depression of mind and body he was labouring under, had such an effect upon him that early in January, thinking he would be unable to be in his place at the opening of Parliament, he sent in his resignation to Mr. Gladstone. But Mr. Gladstone was unwilling to lose the services of one whom he regarded as a most valuable public servant, and after some communication with his medical advisers it was arranged that Mr. Childers should go away and be entirely relieved from business for about a month; at the expiration of which time it was hoped that he would be able to resume his duties, and, at all events, able to decide with more satisfaction to himself and his Colleagues whether it was possible for him to go on or not. That is exactly the state of the case. I do not believe the public service has suffered in the slightest degree from the temporary absence of Mr. Childers—an absence not altogether unprecedented on the part of the head of a Department, for there was one of longer duration a very few years ago. Before Mr. Childers left he prepared the Estimates, and gave directions for their completion. They were submitted to the Cabinet and approved early in December, and my noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) and his Colleagues had no difficulty in working them out, and making such alterations as the latest information rendered necessary. The Estimates, I may add, will be laid on the Table of the House of Commons earlier in the Session than was ever the case in the noble Duke's time or in mine. If when Mr. Childers comes home he thinks it impossible to resume his official duties, I am convinced that no man in the country would be more unwilling to trench on the indulgence of Parliament and the public than he would. He would in that case insist on his resignation being accepted. I hope your Lordships will agree with me, after this explanation, that the delay I ask for is not unreasonable. Whatever political differences may exist as to the value of Mr. Childers's labours, everyone will admit that he has been a hard-working public servant, and it is no extraordinary act of grace to give him a month's absence and rest, in the hope that it may lead to the recovery of his health. The noble Duke, I trust, will not refuse me the short respite, so to speak, that I ask for, until either Mr. Childers is personally in his place again, or we have at least been able to obtain from him that full and accurate information, without which discussion on this subject can hardly be satisfactory either to your Lordships or to the country.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, I entirely sympathize with the noble Viscount in his regret at the illness of Mr. Childers; but when my noble Friend goes on to say we are to put off the discussion of this subject until either he or the noble Earl near him (the Earl of Camperdown) can understand it—that is, until Mr. Childers comes home—I cannot agree with him. Why am I to wait till Mr. Childers comes home? When the First Lord of the Admiralty is in his place again, my noble Friend may say that the House of Commons is the proper place for the discussion; so that the appeal of the noble Viscount really means that this House is not to discuss the state of the Admiralty at all. I therefore feel it my duty to disregard his appeal, and to proceed with my Motion. If it is urged that personal questions should be avoided—which is one of the reasons my noble Friend has offered for the delay—I ask, Who first raised these questions? Who first attacked a Colleague, and sent the attack to the newspapers without that Colleague having the opportunity of seeing it? I ask any public man—I appeal to noble Lords on both sides who have been at the heads of Departments—whether the confidence that is so necessary to the proper working of the public Departments can be maintained if the head of a Department is to go behind a Colleague's back, write a report condemning him, and send it to the newspapers without so much as letting him see it? I am urged not to proceed with my Motion on the ground that it would be so hard on Mr. Childers; but other people have feelings as well as he. I have old Friends and Colleagues at the Admiralty, and if they are attacked unfairly, let nobody suppose that I shall not stand by them. I will now say, first of all, what I consider of the first importance. For six months the defences of the country have been the general theme of discussion. Now, the first line of these defences is the Navy, and I think I can show you that the administration of the Navy is at present in a very unsatisfactory condition. On the first night of the Session the noble Earl (Earl Granville) stated, in answer to a noble Lord opposite, that the Admiralty would go on under the Board as usual. Now, my noble Friend has been engaged all over the world; his mind has been expatiating from China to Washington; and, finding troubles cropping up in every direction, he cannot be expected to know what is going on at the Admiralty. The fact is, the whole system is so altered that the Board does not exist. I will show you how this has come about. An arrangement was made in 1869 by an Order in Council dividing the Board into departments. Now, I do not object to departmental divisions—I agree with having departments—I think it is a good arrangement. There always have been such divisions of business at the Admiralty. I said, when I was in the House of Commons—

“I do not care whether you call it a Board or not, but a civilian must have naval men round him. If he tries to go without their advice, he will get into continual difficulties, the public interest will suffer, and the profession of the Navy will be discontented with its management.”

Whether it is called a Board or heads of departments, so long as they meet to discuss together with the First Lord all important questions, I do not care. It is no matter by what name you call them, or whether they discuss in a Board-room or in the room of the First Lord; but it is essential that the heads of such departments as those for the building of ships and the fitting-out of vessels should meet with the First Lord, and discuss with him naval questions, for otherwise, as great misfortunes have already arisen, so they will again arise from keeping the heads of departments entirely separate. If the First Lord chooses to treat all the naval men around him as mere clerks, if he gives them their directions and sends them away, this must create not only great discontent but also great inefficiency. I should like to know what is the Navy for? It is for use in time of war, I suppose. Now, suppose a war should break out, and the First Lord should say—“I am responsible for everything,” I think the country would look with no little surprise upon any gentleman who, with no knowledge of naval affairs, should undertake to direct great naval operations. It would not do, unless he had a Naval Council and listened to their requests. Yet that is the course which Mr. Childers seems to have taken—he has declared in the House of Commons over and over again that he was responsible for everything, everybody else being responsible to him; he insisted that the responsibility to Parliament and the country rested entirely on himself. When, however, that catastrophe—the loss of the Captain—happened, he wrote, as soon as he had recovered from the dreadful shock of that terrible calamity, an elaborate Report to show that he was not responsible at all. He laid the responsibility on the Controller of the Navy. Now, the Controller of the Navy had always objected to the building of the Captain. As long ago as when I was at the Admiralty, both he and the Constructor of the Navy strongly objected to vessels of that kind for sea-going purposes. The Controller said they might do for coasting purposes; but “do not,” he said, “go and put masts and sails in them with a low freeboard, or you will have some catastrophe.” So much impressed was I with this that in 1869, before the other vessels were going to be built, I called attention in this House to the matter, and reminded you that the Monitor went down head foremost. I was told, in reply, that these vessels sat the water like a duck; but I remarked that they might also go down to the bottom like a diver: and I urged that before any more of such vessels were built we should have a little experience from trials of the Captain at sea. I was told, in reply, we do not want any lesson from the Captain; we know all about it, and the Captain can teach us nothing. Can the Captain teach them nothing now? The vessel went down, and people all asked how it came about, and whether there was any Report from the Controller? It turns out there had been a Report by the Controller condemnatory of the Captain as early as May, 1870. The First Lord laid on the Table of the House of Commons a laudatory Report from Sir Thomas Symonds in July, 1870; but he did not produce the condemnatory Report. Stranger still, he seems to have been of opinion, with many persons in the House of Commons, that this was the best style of vessel that could be built. Although the Controller pointed out when it was built that it was two feet deeper than it ought to have been—a very serious fault—yet, nevertheless, when Mr. Reed left, it is said that Mr. Childers offered the situation of Chief Constructor to the builder of the Captain. What sort of management was this? I say this was the management of a civilian, and that if he had had consultations with naval men this would not have happened. They do not seem to have been allowed to give their opinion. They come into the room, I suppose, and are sent out again. I undertake to say that there has hardly been a meeting of the Board for weeks and weeks. My noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) said the other night that the Naval Estimates had been settled by Mr. Childers. I deny that they were settled by Mr. Childers. As far as I can ascertain he settled the first two Votes, but not some of the most important ones, and the Memorandum he left was altogether set aside when he was gone. The fact is nobody is responsible for these Estimates: and this is what the House of Commons calls perfect responsibility, having one man entirely responsible. A vessel goes down and nobody is responsible. The Estimates are brought forward and nobody is responsible. Is this, I ask, the way things are to go on, and are we to wait till Mr. Childers comes home and can explain it all in the House of Commons? Why has the Controller left the Admiralty? The correspondence on the subject published in The Times this morning is the most extraordinary and curious I ever saw. I wondered when I read it where in the world Mr. Kinnaird was. He should have been at hand to explain what Mr. Gladstone should have written. The real position of affairs at the Admiralty at the present moment is that there is now nobody there who has the whole grasp of the Department in his hands. The absence of the First Lord is like the removal of the spring from the works of a watch; the other members know their several departments, but not the Admiralty as a whole. There is the Secretary, who is very good for his own work—the buying and selling stores. I have heard accusations against him; but I believe he has been doing the duties of his department remarkably well, and has brought about economy. Look at the Order in Council of 1870. It was most mischievous. It said that if a man remains at the Admiralty a certain time without active service he is to retire. And what is the effect of that? Lord John Hay is at this moment obliged to run away in the course of the next fortnight, or he would lose his position in the Navy under that Order. The effect of that same Order would have been to prevent the employment of Lord Lyons and Sir Alexander Milne. Why should such men be excluded? Why should the Government thus restrict its own power of selection? I could never see any good that could arise from it; but I can see that great mischief has arisen from it. Men will not enter the Admiralty for fear of being put on the shelf, or, if they enter it, they are always on the look-out for some occupation to avoid being shelved. Can anything be worse than this? An officer who looks after the details of management at one of the dockyards can keep his flag flying and have his time counted as active service; but if he comes to the Admiralty, where he has to look to the interest of the Navy from Japan to the River Plate, to consider the available force at each station all round the world, and decide where the naval stores and supplies of coal are to be kept—a serious question in time of war—he is told—"You are not in active employment and must therefore be put on the shelf." No statesman would have made such a monstrous system. Another most injurious Order is that limiting the number of lieutenants to 600. I showed last year that during five or six years of peace more than 600 had been fully employed, and that in war they were the strength of the Navy. I have since had many letters from naval men of all ranks, telling me I was quite right, that the lieutenants are the backbone of the Navy, and that cutting down their numbers in this manner would be detrimental to the honour and safety of the country. Is this, again, no subject for inquiry? The present state of the Admiralty, without a First Lord, without a Controller, without a Chief Constructor, without a Storekeeper, without a Controller of Victualling, without a Chief Engineer, is clearly a ground for inquiry. I wish to restrict it to a few points. As to administration by the heads of departments, I do not think the country and Parliament understand how the present system works. When I was at the Admiralty the Board met for an hour and a half every day. All the Lords heard the transactions, and anyone of them could state objections to anything that was done. When more difficult questions arose, I asked them to come into my room at a later hour, where these questions could be more fully discussed; but all the routine work was transacted in the Board-room, as I say, where everybody was together, and then the Secretary heard and knew all about everything, whereas now he can only answer for his own department. This state of things could not work if the services of the Navy were required for active operations. In the event of war, the first thing that would be done would be to alter the system, for the country would not be satisfied with a civilian First Lord solely responsible for the operations of the Navy. They would say—"Give us a Naval Lord who knows something about the matter." While I was at the Admiralty the difficulty about the Trent happened. One of the Lords asked me what would be done if there were war. I replied—"I can tell you one thing I shall do. You will have to sleep on the Admiralty Board table, for I will not let you go away from the office. I will not be responsible without having three or four of my Colleagues at hand, and if you have to sleep in the Board-room you must make up your mind to it." Any civilian ought to feel the same, for there would occur innumerable questions to be decided, and orders to be given which he could not undertake without professional advice. If Mr. Childers does not come back to the Admiralty—I hope it will not be so—the Prime Minister will have to look round the Benches behind him to catch a new First Lord—for he must be a Member of the House of Commons, though the noble Viscount (Viscount Halifax) has been sitting in the Admiralty nest, just keeping the eggs warm till Mr. Childers comes back. But if he should not come back the Prime Minister will have to find on the Benches behind him somebody who can speak fluently, and somebody secure of re-election—and this is not always an easy matter; what with the Permissive Bill, and what with the Contagious Diseases Act, and one thing and another, I am afraid he would be in great difficulties. These are some of the difficulties in selecting a First Lord: but when he has been obtained, what is he to do? He will not have the advantage of a Board. Where there is a Board discussing the various matters of Admiralty business, a man with a little common sense can pick up the merits of the case and form a decision, if he hears competent people state their opinions; but if he goes into a room by himself and is asked to settle difficult questions off-hand, or if anyone were to put a question to him in the House, he will be in a disadvantageous position, not having heard the matter previously discussed.

The Duke of Somerset

As I have said, I think departmental divisions good; but I want to add to departmental division some means of joining frequent meetings, in which naval opinions can be properly considered. I think I have shown good grounds for an inquiry; and when Mr. Childers comes back he will be a most useful witness on many points.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the Board of Admiralty with reference to the recent changes in the constitution of the Board and the practical working of the Department."—(The Duke of Somerset.)

VISCOUNT MELVILLE said, he was very glad that the noble Duke had brought forward this Motion, for never was there a Department in greater confusion than the Admiralty was at that moment—it was worse even than prevailed at the War Office. He understood that the Board of Admiralty did not exist, as it used or ought to do, by virtue of the patent which authorized its members to exercise the duties of Lord High Admiral. The name of the Secretary did not appear in the patent, as he was nominally appointed by the Board, though really by the Government, and he was, in truth, the servant of the Board and not its master. Now, however, he was informed that the Secretary was placed over the various Lords of the Admiralty, and they took orders from him instead of giving them to him. He (Viscount Melville) could not understand how the Naval Lords could submit to such an indignity being placed upon them. In the absence of Mr. Childers the First Sea Lord should be the person to carry on the duties of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Whether this were so he did not know. What the noble Duke had now stated he had previously heard was perfectly true—that the Lords of the Admiralty now never sat as a Board, and never consulted together upon naval matters or the supply of stores, or other things which a Board should discuss. Each acted in his own department, and one Lord did not know what the other did. Instead of this they should act with unanimity. With regard to the Order in Council, he was at a loss to see how such an Order could supersede the patent issued by the Queen, commanding certain gentlemen to execute the office of Lord High Admiral. He was perfectly certain, from all he heard out-of-doors, and from the dissatisfaction that existed in the Navy, that the noble Duke had done the greatest service in moving for this Committee, and he should heartily support the Motion.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: The House will not be surprised if I have some difficulty in determining at which point I am to begin, where so many have been dealt with; for the noble Duke has touched upon everything connected with the Navy, as well as the administration of the Admiralty, down to the latest Order in Council, and the unfortunate loss of the Captain. I think your Lordships will excuse me if I do not again open the debate upon the Order in Council, when it is recollected that it was so fully discussed in this House last year. I shall, therefore, pass it over with the simple remark that the noble Duke was not correct in saying that officers cannot now serve at the Admiralty if they wish to avoid being placed upon the retired list, for no officer of flag rank can be placed upon the retired list until he has been for 10 years not upon full pay. The noble Duke may be right in his opinion; but still it has been maintained that a flag officer to be of service at a crisis, and to be fit to take the command of a fleet at sea, ought to have been in command within the previous 10 years. There have, it is true, been a few notable exceptions; but I would ask your Lordships whether you think it would be well, as a general rule, to count an officer who had spent 15 or 20 years in the civil departments of the Admiralty as available for service at sea? I will pass briefly over what has been said with regard to the Captain, because I have already laid upon the Table the Minute of the First Lord, and I have given Notice that I shall move to-morrow for the reply of Sir Spencer Robinson; and when your Lordships are in possession of the facts, it is possible that your Lordships may have a debate upon the subject. With reference to Sir Spencer Robinson, I am sure your Lordships will excuse me from undertaking the unpleasant and almost impossible task of discussing matters which turn on questions of fact as to what passed between the First Lord and the Controller, and of which they alone are cognizant. Adverting, then, to the real subject of the debate—the constitution of the present Board of Admiralty—I may remind your

Lordships that the Board was constituted under the Order in Council of 1869, and that the main principles on which it was founded were three in number. They were—first, that the First Lord should be supreme, and have entire control over the Board; second, that each of the other Lords should be individually responsible to him for their respective departments; and third, that there should be complete control over all expenditure of money by officers responsible to Parliament. I am glad to hear from the noble Duke that he is in favour of the departmental system, for that is one great point gained in favour of the present system. At present, all transactions involving expenditure of money must be approved by at least two members of the Board. I suppose the noble Duke, when speaking of the old Board, did not intend to imply that every single transaction in his time was considered by the full Board before being finally settled. I can assure the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Melville) that it is an entire mistake to suppose that the Board of Admiralty never meet. Until the illness of the First Lord it met twice in each week; and there is nothing to prevent any member of the Board from bringing any matter he wishes to have discussed before the Board. I can also assure the noble Duke that it is an error to think that the First Lord treats his naval Colleagues simply as clerks. He considers them as his equals, with whom he is only too delighted and anxious to consult. I will venture to say that on no occasion has any one of his Colleagues who has gone to see the First Lord, or expressed a desire to discuss any question with him, ever met with anything but the most courteous attention; and that no proposal has been rejected without careful consideration. The noble Duke says that the place of the Naval Lords during a crisis was at the Admiralty, and that in the case of the Trent affair he expected them to find their beds in the Board-room. I am happy to say that during the present Board's tenure of office no such crisis has arisen; but, in the event of such a contingency, I hope Sir Sydney Dacres, and the other Naval Lord, will find the table of the sitting-room of the First Lord a not more inconvenient resting place than the Board-room table in the noble Duke's days. The noble Viscount (Viscount Melville) has just said that no one at the Admiralty knows what his Colleagues are doing. Such a thing may be possible; but, if so, it is the fault of the person who is in ignorance, because they all receive a daily Minute of all transactions of any importance in every department. The noble Duke also stated that nobody is responsible for the Estimates, and he said that he was in a position to prove that the First Lord had nothing, or very little to do with them.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: Only the first two Votes.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: How did the noble Duke obtain that information?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: Grant the Committee, and I will tell you.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I think the noble Duke need not ask for a Committee, for he already knows everything he proposes the Committee shall find out. He knows more about these matters than I do myself. I may say, however, that the number of men in the Navy and dockyards were settled, and the whole skeleton of the Estimates made out by the First Lord himself, and the figures were discussed and settled in the Cabinet; therefore, it is hardly fair to say that he had nothing to do with the Estimates. The noble Duke referred to the position of the Secretary to the Admiralty. I have heard all sorts of complaints about him. It has been said over and over again that he is not able to purchase stores, and that he has no stores; the Leader of the Opposition in "another place" has said that there is an extreme lack of stores and provisions, and that we are living on what was left by the Conservative Government. So far is this from being the case, that when it was considered advisable that assistance should be sent to Paris to relieve its distress, my hon. Friend the Secretary was able to send no less a quantity of provisions than 2,500 tons at one day's notice, and I think your Lordships are bound to admit that that is one point in his favour. I have heard it said to-night that the Secretary is at present practically the First Lord. The simple fact is, that no expenditure of large amount can be made without his sanction. The arrangement is a simple and intelligible one. The principle was laid down in the Order of 1869 that no money should be spent without the authority of those who are responsible to Parliament: it therefore follows that, during the First Lord's absence, that officer who is responsible to Parliament should, for the time, take upon himself the responsibility of financial control. I believe I have now answered all the questions addressed to me; but, if I have omitted anything, I shall be glad to be reminded of it. Without presuming to dictate to the noble Duke, I cannot help saying that I think he has shown no special reason for granting a Committee of Inquiry into the position of the Admiralty at the present time. There is this one great objection to an inquiry, that it would greatly interfere with the working of the Department the operations of which the noble Duke is so anxious to facilitate. If he has any grievance to allege against the Admiralty, I would ask him to give us, in some specific terms, the Instructions which he proposes to give to this Committee.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I did not distinctly understand from the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to resist the Motion. If it is not intended to refuse this Committee, I will not say another word about it; but if the Government do intend to resist the Motion, then I shall offer a very few words, confining myself to the simple question—Ought we to grant this Committee or ought we not? It is admitted by Her Majesty's Government that there has been a very important change in the working of the Board of Admiralty. Until two years ago a system was maintained which, practically as well as theoretically, was, in my opinion, a wise one. It maintained the complete control of the Executive Government over this great Department of the State, by placing at its head a person who generally and properly was a civilian; but, in order that he might not be left without proper professional advice and assistance, the First Lord of the Admiralty was required to carry on the business of the Department with the assistance of other Lords, some of whom were necessarily naval officers, practically acquainted with naval matters. This arrangement in no way detracted from the complete authority of the First Lord, for if differences of opinion unfortunately arose between him and one of his Colleagues no division of the Board took place on the subject, but the authority of the First Lord was invariably acknowledged, and any Naval Lord who, upon a grave question, was unable to concur with him in opinion felt it his duty to resign. Several well-known cases of this kind have occurred. The proper and legitimate authority and responsibility of the First Lord as the head of the Department and a Minister of the Crown were thus kept unimpaired, but at the same time the Sea Lords of the Admiralty had a responsibility to the profession and the country, and if any measures which they thought unfair to the profession or injurious to the country were proposed, though they could not control the action of the First Lord, yet by their resignation they had it in their power very plainly to convey to the profession and the country their sense of these proposals. If, on the other hand, those Naval Lords continued to hold their offices, they were in the same position as an Under Secretary would be who waived his own opinion and accepted his share of responsibility for the course taken by the Government. This was the theory of the Board of Admiralty as formerly constituted; and effect was given to the system by periodical and frequent meetings of the Board, at which all important matters were brought forward and discussed, being first prepared for consideration in the several departments. The noble Earl who has just spoken took great credit to the present First Lord for the departmental system; but this is by no means a new thing at the Admiralty. In consequence of the Notice given by my noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) I referred to the speech of Sir James Graham, in which he described the alterations that were made in 1832, when the minor Boards—the Navy Board and Victualling Board—were abolished and the whole business was concentrated at the Admiralty, and I find that he then distinctly explained his proposal to be that each Lord of the Admiralty should, in his own department, be specially charged with the conduct of the business, and should have the assistance of a permanent officer who would not give up his place upon any changes of the Administration. To the success of this system periodical meetings of the Board were absolutely essential; for unless those meetings were held, and an opportunity were afforded of discussing the various questions as they arose, and thus bringing more than one opinion to bear for the information of the First Lord, there was a very great chance of mistakes being made. Such was the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and for many years it worked well. Two years ago, however, when the Navy Estimates were brought forward, we learnt that Mr. Childers described very considerable alterations which were contemplated. I believe that in the form of the patent no change occurred—appointments and Orders were still issued nominally by the authority of the Board of Admiralty. But if I rightly recollect the speech made by Mr. Childers in moving the Estimates in 1869, he distinctly said that the consultations of the Board were practically to be discontinued, and that in future the responsibility would fall upon him exclusively, after he had communicated with each individual member of the Board as to his own special department. That is my understanding of the speech as we find it recorded, and it is in accordance with the common report of what actually occurred in the Department. Now that, I say, was a most important change; and after the new system has been some two years in operation, is it not right that we should proceed to make inquiry how it works? Is it not especially incumbent upon us to do so when circumstances have arisen leading, if not forcing, the public to believe that the results of this absence of consultation have been most serious? Take one case. The catastrophe of which we all heard with such surprise and such grief and horror, would that have occurred if the old system of conducting business at the Admiralty had been adhered to? If the Naval Lords had discussed, in the presence of the First Lord, the propriety of sending such a ship as the Captain to sea with masts and sails at a stormy season of the year, would that ship have been allowed to incur the risk to which she was exposed? My Lords, I must confess my belief that she would not. At all events, if there had been such a discussion, and if the question whether at such a time she ought to have been employed on such a service had been fairly considered, there would have been no question then as to who was responsible. The whole subject would have

(Viscount Melville) has just said that no one at the Admiralty knows what his Colleagues are doing. Such a thing may be possible; but, if so, it is the fault of the person who is in ignorance, because they all receive a daily Minute of all transactions of any importance in every department. Several well-known cases of this kind have occurred. The proper and legitimate authority and responsibility of the First Lord as the head of the Department and a Minister of the Crown were thus kept unimpaired, but at the same time the Sea Lords of the Admiralty had a responsibility to the profession and the country, and if any measures which they thought unfair to the profession or injurious to the country were proposed, though they could not control the action of the First Lord, yet by their resignation they had it in their power very plainly to convey to the profession and the country their sense of these proposals. If, on the other hand, those Naval Lords continued to hold their offices, they were in the same position as an Under Secretary would be who waived his own opinion and accepted his share of responsibility for the course taken by the Government. This was the theory of the Board of Admiralty as formerly constituted; and effect was given to the system by periodical and frequent meetings of the Board, at which all important matters were brought forward and discussed, being first prepared for consideration in the several departments. The noble Earl who has just spoken took great credit to the present First Lord for the departmental system; but this is by no means a new thing at the Admiralty. In consequence of the Notice given by my noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) I referred to the speech of Sir James Graham, in which he described the alterations that were made in 1832, when the minor Boards—the Navy Board and Victualling Board—were abolished and the whole business was concentrated at the Admiralty, and I find that he then distinctly explained his proposal to be that each Lord of the Admiralty should, in his own department, be specially charged with the conduct of the business, and should have the assistance of a permanent officer who would not give up his place upon any changes of the Administration. To the success of this system periodical meetings of the Board were absolutely essential; for unless

those meetings were held, and an opportunity were afforded of discussing the various questions as they arose, and thus bringing more than one opinion to bear for the information of the First Lord, there was a very great chance of mistakes being made. Such was the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and for many years it worked well. Two years ago, however, when the Navy Estimates were brought forward, we learnt that Mr. Childers described very considerable alterations which were contemplated. I believe that in the form of the patent no change occurred — appointments and Orders were still issued nominally by the authority of the Board of Admiralty. But if I rightly recollect the speech made by Mr. Childers in moving the Estimates in 1869, he distinctly said that the consultations of the Board were practically to be discontinued, and that in future the responsibility would fall upon him exclusively, after he had communicated with each individual member of the Board as to his own special department. That is my understanding of the speech as we find it recorded, and it is in accordance with the common report of what actually occurred in the Department. Now that, I say, was a most important change; and after the new system has been some two years in operation, is it not right that we should proceed to make inquiry how it works? Is it not especially incumbent upon us to do so when circumstances have arisen leading, if not forcing, the public to believe that the results of this absence of consultation have been most serious? Take one case. The catastrophe of which we all heard with such surprise and such grief and horror, would that have occurred if the old system of conducting business at the Admiralty had been adhered to? If the Naval Lords had discussed, in the presence of the First Lord, the propriety of sending such a ship as the Captain to sea with masts and sails at a stormy season of the year, would that ship have been allowed to incur the risk to which she was exposed? My Lords, I must confess my belief that she would not. At all events, if there had been such a discussion, and if the question whether at such a time she ought to have been employed on such a service had been fairly considered, there would have been no question then as to who was responsible. The whole subject would have been before the Board, a Minute would have been made, and every member who acquiesced in that Minute would have shared the responsibility. This one single circumstance — for I will not trouble your Lordships by going into others which occur to me — establishes to my mind a prima facie case, showing that the important change made in the working of the Board of Admiralty two years ago was an injudicious change, and one which is not working satisfactorily. I do not say more; it is possible that upon inquiry it may be shown that no one was to blame with respect to the catastrophe I have referred to, and that the new mode of transacting business may be better than the old one. But I do assert that a prima facie case exists for believing that the change at the Admiralty was a change for the worse, and that inquiry by Parliament is imperatively demanded. At this moment, in the agitated state of the world, I do not think it would be becoming of your Lordships to go into minute details—to inquire into a mistake here or a mistake there; the less interference in that way with a Department the better—but there is, I think, strong ground for inquiring whether the general system of management introduced two years ago at the Admiralty in substitution for the system which formerly prevailed is or is not a wise one. That is my reason for supporting the Motion; and I do trust Her Majesty's Government will not put us to the pain of going to a division. Can they, I ask, in the face of the country and with the strong grounds which exist for investigation, refuse an inquiry which will let us ascertain for ourselves the working of the system? I earnestly trust they will grant the Committee; and I equally trust that the noble Duke, in conducting the inquiry, will abstain from the discussion of details which have nothing to do with the functions of Parliament and can only be dealt with properly by an Executive Department, and will confine himself to the broad and leading question of the constitution of the Board, which, in my opinion, forms a most legitimate subject for inquiry.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: My Lords, I think this House cannot refuse to grant the Committee asked for by the noble Duke. A state of things has been reached in the world in which men's minds are turned to war, and when public feeling generally is growing anxious on the subject of our defences. I look upon the Admiralty as a mysterious office. The public know nothing of its deliberations, and can only judge by the results. It is the custom, I know, to boast of the strength of our Navy, and of the number and condition of our ships. To my mind, they are nothing but experimental ships, every one of them. It may prove, in the end, that they are neither fitted to act together as a squadron of defence, nor to keep the sea as individual cruisers. And then we are confronted with the difficulty of not knowing what to do with it, or how to keep the fleet in order. If our ships were brought into battle and were shattered — and the chances are that they would be very seriously injured—it would be found that no arrangements had been made in our dockyards and arsenals for repairing them. Every ship in the present Navy differs from all the rest in the dimensions of her masts, sails, and engines, and consequently a different fitting is required for every ship. Such a system, it is obvious, is very expensive, and must lead to a great loss of time. In former days there was a complete understanding with regard to classes. We had then four classes of ships, four kinds of masts, four kinds of sails, and so on. The result was that in the event of a vessel being shattered, she could be soon repaired. If the Committee were appointed, it would be able to expose the defects in the present system; and the result would be that the Admiralty, instead of taking into their councils iron-ship builders, steam-engine makers, and men of that kind, would look to old and practised seamen, who had some idea as to what the equipment of a ship ought to be. For although we now employ steamships, it is most important that their sailing qualities should not be overlooked. The first point was that our ships of war should be made safe and seaworthy; the second is speed; and the third is to equip them with efficiency. I am afraid that the first point—safety—has of late years been overlooked, and that our ships are dangerous. The result of the late catastrophe will, I trust, be that the ships of our Navy will be made safe; and another consequence will be that experimental ships will be at an end. We have made sufficient experiments to show what we wanted; and if those experiments were united they will bring about the production of a good fleet. I maintain that we still require what we had in olden times. What we require are sea cruisers, an equipment suited to the narrow seas around this island, and a complete system of conveying troops with facility and despatch to all parts of the world. Above all, we require complete means of defending our whole Empire. All these points being of the utmost importance require careful consideration. In the Speech from the Throne, Parliament was not requested to examine into the state of the Navy; for I suppose Her Majesty was told by her responsible Advisers that the Navy was perfect. I assert, on the contrary, that the Navy—looking at the difficult circumstances in which the country is placed—was never in so useless a condition as at present. I thoroughly believe that the proposed inquiry will be of immense value, as it will bring to light, first of all, the secrets of the Admiralty, and, next, the secrets with regard to the construction of the Navy.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, the noble Earl on the cross Benches (Earl Grey) had very correctly described the constitution of the Board of Admiralty as it was modified by Sir James Graham, in 1832. He himself had had the honour of holding, at one time, the position of Secretary to the Admiralty, and afterwards that of First Lord, and he had never thought there was much room for improvement in the mode of working and management of the Department. Formerly, the Senior Sea Lord was charged with superintending the department which had the building of ships of war, and the second Lord with superintending that which had the responsibility of providing stores; and it struck him there was a great deal to be said in favour of uniting these two departments, which must work together, under one head. The noble Duke had said it was quite immaterial whether the members of the Board met in the Board-room or in the First Lord's room, provided that the First Lord did actually consult his naval advisers. There were three naval officers at the Admiralty, and there was no reason why the First Lord should not consult them. The Board meetings were held twice a week, and any member had only to bring forward any proposition for it to be taken into consideration, and the opportunity was afforded for the statement of individual opinion. He denied the correctness of the assertion that the loss of the Captain was due to the Board not having met more frequently. His noble Friend said that a warning would have been given if the Board had met. From whom would the warning have come? The most likely person to have given such a warning was Sir Spencer Robinson, who disapproved of the construction of the Captain in some respects, but entertained no fears for her safety. In a Paper prepared by Sir Spencer Robinson after her loss, dated some day in November, and printed in the Appendix to the Minute of Mr. Childers, this sentence occurred—

“ I am still of opinion that the ship was safe, if properly handled, so far as relates to her stability at her loadline, and the means existing to restore it as she became lighter.”

There would be laid on the Table of their Lordships' House a Paper, which was the answer of Sir Spencer Robinson to the Minute of Mr. Childers, and in this Sir Spencer Robinson said—

“ Neither did I nor Mr. Reed consider that the Captain was unsafe to be tried at sea, if properly handled.”

That might be said of any ship in the world; and any ship, if improperly handled, might be upset. When the designer and the builder of the Captain, when the Chief Constructor and Controller of the Navy, stated their opinion that there was no risk in sending the Captain to sea, and when it was obvious from all the Papers, whatever might have been the qualities of the ship in other respects, that no one considered she was unsafe, it was out of the question to maintain that there could have been any warning of her being unsafe. If a Committee was to be appointed, he hoped the scope of its inquiry would be restricted, as suggested by the words of the noble Duke's Motion, that it would be confined to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty and the practical working of the Department, and that it would not extend to the Order in Council of last summer and other matters, as the noble Duke seemed to suggest that it should. The noble Duke fell into one or two curious mistakes; and one was as to the effect of the Order of 1870, which applied to admirals a rule, as to service in the Admiralty, that had been applied to captains from time immemorial. The noble Duke said that the Order in Council of 1870 would have deprived the country of the services of Lord Lyons. Now, it so happened that the Order in Council which would have had that effect, was an Order in Council passed by the noble Duke himself in 1866, fixing for the first time the age at which admirals must be removed from the active list. Unless his memory failed him Lord Lyons, at the time when he was performing such distinguished service in the Black Sea, was above the limit of age named in the Order of 1866. It was the Order in Council of the noble Duke himself, and not that of Mr. Childers, which would have deprived the country of the services of Lord Lyons. Although the Committee would be inconvenient, he offered no opposition to its appointment, if it were clearly understood that its inquiry was to be limited by the words of the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

And, on Thursday, February 23, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

EDUCATION—ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is aware that the Endowed Schools Commissioners have, in a Communication addressed by them to one of the Trustees of the Endowed School at Mitcheldean, in the county of Gloucester, made the following statement:—

“The general principle on which Educational Endowments are dealt with by the Commissioners is that they should not be devoted to purely Elementary Education, which is now fully provided for by law;”

and whether, acting in pursuance of that statement, it is the intention of the Commissioners generally to devote to education of a higher grade funds which have been distinctly left for the purpose of primary or elementary education?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the hon. Baronet would see from the Endowed Schools Act of 1869 that no power was given to the Commissioners to devote any sum to any particular purpose, and that the duty of the Commissioners was to prepare schemes to be submitted to the Education Department, and, if approved, to be submitted to the House before taking legal effect. Under these circumstances, it would hardly become the House to interfere with the mode in which the Commissioners prepared the schemes, the Government being responsible for the shape which those recommendations eventually assumed. He could not, therefore, give a distinct answer to the Question; but he had been requested by the Commissioners to state that they were extremely anxious that everyone concerned in this movement should be fully apprised of them, and it was only fair to point out that the quotation made by the hon. Baronet presented a different appearance when read with its context.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL COMMUNICATION BETWEEN THE HEBRIDES AND THE MAINLAND OF SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the want of sufficient postal accommodation between the Hebrides and the mainland of Scotland; whether he does not think it expedient to regulate the postal service so that the mail may be conveyed to and from Loch Maddy three times a week, wind and weather permitting, in winter as in summer, and so to alter the present arrangements as to insure letters being delivered in Glasgow or Edinburgh in less than eleven days from the date of their being posted in Loch Maddy; and, whether it is intended that the district of the West Highlands shall participate in the advantages of the Telegraph Act 1868, and the Acts amending and extending the same; and, if so, when telegraphic communication may be expected to be established with the head post offices of Fort Augustus and Fort William?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, the hon. Member was inaccurate in stating that 11 days were occupied in transmitting letters from Glasgow or Edinburgh to Loch Maddy. Letters leaving the latter place on Wednesday morning reached Edinburgh or Glasgow on Saturday; but letters from Loch Maddy, despatched on Friday, did not reach their destination until Tuesday, the mails being delayed on their way during Sunday. The postal revenue from this service was less than half the cost. He admitted the present arrangements were not entirely satisfactory. A full inquiry would be made into the matter, which he hoped would lead to a satisfactory alteration. The Department had had great difficulties to contend with in reference to telegraphic communication; but it had succeeded in doubling the number of stations, and adding from 12,000 to 15,000 miles of wire. He hoped that by the end of May telegraphic communication would be established to Fort Augustus.

RITUAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill early this Session dealing with the Reports of the Ritual Commission?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he had nothing to add to the answer given to a similar Question a few days ago by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Government were in communication with the more eminent members of the Episcopal Bench on the subject, and they were waiting to hear from these right rev. Prelates before arriving at a final decision. He had reason to believe that would not be long.

EDUCATION—THE REVISED CODE.

QUESTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked the Vice President of the Privy Council, When he will lay upon the Table of the House the Revised Code on Education?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he would lay the Revised Code on the Table of the House to-morrow, and at the same time he would also lay on the Table a Minute of the Educational Department with regard to instructions to school Inspectors with reference to the Time Table Conscience Clause, and also with reference to the examination of pupil teachers educated in Training Colleges. He hoped the Paper would be in the hands of hon. Members on Saturday or Monday at the latest.

PROTECTION OF INFANT LIFE.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill early this Session for the protection of infant life?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the subject of the hon. Member's Question had received the anxious attention of the Government; but he was sorry to say they were unable to promise legislation on the subject at an early period. He was aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman, and those who were associated with him in this work, had prepared a Bill, and if he would introduce it the measure should receive the attentive consideration of the Government.

TREATY OF PARIS (1856)—DECLARATION OF MR. ODO RUSSELL.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the declaration made by Mr. Odo Russell to Count Bismarck on the 21st November (contained in No. 76, page 45, of the Correspondence respecting the Treaty of March 1856)—namely, that "The question was one which Mr. Odo Russell had frankly proved to Count Bismarck was of a nature in its present state to compel us, with or without Allies, to go to war with Russia," was authorized by Her Majesty's Government, and what preparation Her Majesty's Government had made in support of their threat?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said: The argument used by Mr. Odo Russell to Count Bismarck, as reported by him to Her Majesty's Government in the despatch alluded to, was not one which had been directed by Her Majesty's Government. In saying that, I do not imply the slightest blame attached to Mr. Odo Russell, because it is perfectly well known that it is the duty of Her Majesty's diplomatic agents abroad to use their best discretion in the mode in which they think they can support the argument or proposition it might be their duty to procure the acceptance of. I do not attach the slightest blame to Mr. Odo Russell in the matter; but such is the fact, that it was not under any specific authority or instruction from Her Majesty's Government that the argument referred to was used by him.

DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS IN GERMANY. QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is the intention of the Government, in consequence of the establishment of the German Empire, to abolish the Missions at Munich and Stuttgart, and also to take the present opportunity for withdrawing the Secretaries of Legation and Chargés d'Affaires from Coburg, Darmstadt, and Dresden?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, that with respect to the Mission at Stuttgart the vacancy that occurred there a few months since had not been filled up; and in regard to the other places mentioned by the hon. Member, any possible changes that might occur were still under consideration by the Foreign Department.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE OFFICE.—QUESTION.

SIR HERBERT CROFT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to establish a Government Life Insurance Office?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he had never concealed his opinion that Government would confer a great benefit upon the country if it were to give absolute security for life insurance. He must, however, hesitate before attempting to undertake it, because his opinion did not appear to be very extensively shared in by the public. Until the people asked for it, he did not think it would be wise in the Government to adopt it.

FACTORY ACTS—THE WORKSHOPS ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention, during the present Session, to take any steps to enforce the provisions of the Workshops Act, which is in many places altogether a dead letter, by making the present Government Inspectors of Factories responsible for workshops, or by any other means?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he was afraid the inspection of all workshops under the Workshops Act could not be effectually carried out without largely increasing the present number of Factory Inspectors, and he had more than once expressed an opinion that the subject could only be properly dealt with by a modification of the existing Acts. He had given instructions to have the matter inquired into, and hoped before long to lay the result of those inquiries before Parliament.

TRUCK COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is able to state when the Report of the Truck Commission will be laid upon the Table; and, whether he proposes to legislate upon it during the present Session?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, the Commissioners had finished their sittings, so far as taking evidence was concerned; but he was afraid six weeks at least must expire before the Report would be ready. Until he had had an opportunity of considering the Report, it would be impossible for him to say whether any and what alterations of the present Act might be found to be necessary.

NAVY—COMMITTEE ON DESIGNS OF SHIPS OF WAR.—QUESTION.

MR. CORRY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Committee on Designs of Ships of War has been called on to report on certain modifications which have been proposed by the Admiralty of the designs of Her Majesty's ships "Devastation," "Thunderer," "Fury," and of the four ships of the Cyclops class; if so, whether the building of those ships will be suspended until the Committee shall have reported fully on the subject; and, whether the Committee will be requested to report generally on the designs, and not on proposed modifications only; and, if so, whether the building of the ships will be suspended until the report of the Committee shall have been considered by the Admiralty?

MR. BAXTER: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that the Committee on Designs of Ships of War has been called on to report not only on the modifications which have been proposed by the Admiralty on the designs of the ships referred to, but generally on the designs as well. He will find this in the Instructions given to the Committee for which the hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) moves to-night; and a fortnight ago a letter was addressed to the Committee begging that the Reports on vessels of the Devastation and Cyclops classes should be considered at the very earliest period, and as soon as the Report is received it shall have the immediate attention of the Admiralty. The four ships of the Cyclops class are being built by contract, and it would, therefore, be impossible to suspend the work, and the Devastation and the Thunderer are so far advanced that it has not been thought desirable to stop the work on them; but the work on the Fury will be suspended in the meantime.

ARMY—RECRUITING.—QUESTION.

MR. DICKINSON asked the Secretary of State for War, What number of men have left the Army, and how many have enlisted since the 1st of August 1870; and, whether the 20,000 men voted at the end of last Session have all been enlisted, or how many, and for what term of service, whether for Army Service, or partly for Army Service and partly for service in the Reserve?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the total number of men recruited was 26,155; of whom 22,772 were for long service, and 3,383 for short service. The net increase was 18,351.

REAL ESTATE INTESTACY BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE KING asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will name an early day for bringing in the Real Estate Intestacy Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not in a position to name an early day for introducing the Bill; but I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that I say this not out of any indifference to the subject, but from a desire that we should take the course most likely to secure the passing of the measure. My experience certainly has not shown me that there is any advantage to a measure in laying it on the Table a very long time before you can be certain of bringing it under the consideration of the House. It will be a very great disappointment to me and to the Government if we are not able practically to bring it before the attention of the House, and pass it this Session.

POOR LAW—SMALL POX.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked the President of the Poor Law Board, If he will state the number of cases of small pox reported among the pauper population of the metropolis, and the extent of the accommodation provided for them, or in immediate preparation?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, the last Returns showed that the total number of these small-pox cases under treatment was 1,228. The accommodation for them consisted of 520 beds in the metropolitan hospitals, and the Boards of Guardians had accommodation for some 300 more, making a total of 820 beds. There were, therefore, 400 beds short that day; but to-morrow 70 more would be provided; and during the next fortnight about 500 more. In the whole, the beds provided would then exceed the number of cases at present known. Some of the accommodation furnished by the Guardians was, however, of an insufficient and temporary character, and it might be requisite to have 200 or 300 additional beds. Of the 400 cases unprovided for the majority were at Bethnal Green, Shoreditch, and Whitechapel. A report had gone abroad that at Shoreditch there were 420 cases unprovided for; but that number was made up by an erroneous calculation. The real number of cases unprovided for at Shore-ditch was about 150—certainly far too many.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—THE DIAMOND DIGGINGS.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government of the Cape of Good Hope has taken any and what steps for the protection of British Subjects at the Diamond Diggings in that Colony?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, that Mr. John Campbell had been appointed a magistrate for the district referred to, under provisions of the Act passed in the 26th and 27th year of the present reign. That gentleman had been received by the inhabitants with the greatest cordiality, and no disturbance was apprehended.

ROYAL FLINTSHIRE RIFLE MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the Royal Flintshire Rifle Militia are still without the supply of breechloading rifles promised to be delivered to them at the end of 1870; and, whether it is intended to supply them with all convenient despatch?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, some had been already distributed, and he hoped shortly the corps would receive the remainder. The delay had arisen in consequence of the Department having been so much occupied of late.

PROTECTION OF LIVERPOOL, &c.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government have made inquiries into the existing means for the protection of Liverpool and other large commercial ports from attack in the event of war; and whether it is their intention to make provision, during the present Session, for the proper security of such ports?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the subject had been under the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government. No proposal had been made in the present Estimates for the protection of those ports.

Mr. Goschen

THE NEW POST OFFICE.

QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the description of the new Post Office published by a member of the council of the Institute of Architects is correct; and, if so, whether any steps will be taken to improve the elevation of that building?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that to make both Question and Answer intelligible, he might explain that a member of the council of the Institute of Architects had described the design of the new Post Office as the ugliest ever conceived, as entirely devoid of all architectural knowledge and treatment, and as the result of the want of skill in the Department of Works consequent upon the arrangements recently made for carrying on the business of that Department. Perhaps the best answer to that was to state exactly what had occurred. The design for the new Post Office was originally prepared by an officer of the Department of Works, under the direction of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), when First Commissioner; but on Mr. Layard taking charge of that Office he had to deal with the design and did not approve it, but in conjunction with Mr. Fergusson, then in the Office of Works, he directed to be prepared what they deemed an improved design, which was sent to the Postmaster General and the Treasury. Being approved by both those Departments, tenders were invited for carrying out the design before he (Mr. Ayrton) became First Commissioner. To show the value of such architectural criticism as the question referred to, he might add that the Council of the Institute of Architects themselves recently recommended that Mr. Fergusson should receive Her Majesty's gold medal for his great knowledge—of which everyone was aware—in matters connected with architecture, and for his instructive writings on the subject, Mr. Fergusson being the gentleman who approved and settled the design for the new Post Office.

ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMISSION.

QUESTIONS.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will state to the House the nature of the powers delegated by Her Majesty's Government to the Anglo-American Commission; and, if the Commission is empowered to close all claims for and against this Country arising out of the sailing of the "Alabama" and "Shenandoah?"

MR. W. H. GREGORY asked, Whether the Commission was empowered to abandon, without previous reference to arbitration, the position hitherto maintained by England of non-liability for the ravages of the "Alabama?"

MR. GLADSTONE: I came down to the House, after carefully looking into the matter, prepared to give an answer to the Question of which Notice has been given, and I will give a distinct answer to it; but I should not wish to answer the Question of the hon. Member for Galway without having first taken time for consideration, lest by answering hastily I might produce an unfair impression, neither do I consider it is expedient at the present for the public interest that I should do so. With regard to the first Question, I understand it to refer to two subjects—the first as to the extent of the subject-matter that would be covered by the powers given to the Commissioners, and next to the nature of those powers. As to the first point, the latter part of the hon. Member's Question is answered with perfect clearness, and in a manner that I cannot improve upon, by the passage on the subject in the Speech from the Throne. The latter part of the paragraph in the Speech describes the purposes of the Commission, and the closing words are these—

"This arrangement will, by common consent, include all claims for compensation which have been, or may be made by each Government, or by its citizens, upon the other."

Then, as to the powers of the Commissioners, I will simply read two passages from the Instructions to the Commissioners. The first of them is this—the Instructions to the Commissioners commence by stating that—

Another passage in the Instructions is as follows:—

"Her Majesty's Government request, however, that if the mode of dealing with any particular matter which you may be disposed to agree to should vary materially from the manner of settlement to which I have informed you Her Majesty's Government are prepared at once to assent, or, in case of any disagreement of importance occurring between yourselves and the American High Commissioners, you should at once report by telegraph, and await further instructions."

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—TERMS OF PEACE.—QUESTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether an application has been made during the last few days by France to the English Government to lend their good offices with a view to secure moderate terms of Peace?

MR. GLADSTONE: Since I answered my hon. Friend's Question on a former day, a communication has been made to Her Majesty's Government by the French Government of Defence, which, as my hon. Friend knows, is at the present moment in the same position as a Ministry in this country which has resigned but holds the Seals of Office until their successors are ready to assume them. I am not in possession of a copy of that communication; but I think I can describe its purport, which I do not think entirely to correspond with the Question of my hon. Friend. The purport of it I understand to be, as it was conveyed by M. Tissot to Lord Granville, that the French Government of Defence expressed a hope, in a form more or less general, that Her Majesty's Government would exercise its influence in a way beneficial to France in reference to the negotiations for peace. In fact, what was intended to be conveyed was a hope on the part of the Government of National Defence that Her Majesty's Government would, in order to facilitate the progress of the negotiations, recognize, with as little delay as possible, the new Government about to be appointed under the authority of the National Assembly. The communication was, as I understand it, the general expression of a wish for the friendly aid of England, and that, generally, the expression pointed specifically to an early recognition of the new Government. In reply to this Lord Granville stated to M. Tissot the satisfaction with which Her Majesty's Government had perceived the orderly manner in which the elections had been conducted in France under circumstances of extreme difficulty, adding that though Her Majesty's Government felt it to be a duty to reserve expressions of opinion for the present, they had made preparation to recognize the French Government without the slightest possible delay on its assuming Office.

IRELAND—LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. GREGORY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government during the present Session to bring in any measure to promote the improvement of Labourers' Habitations in Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, an Act passed in 1860, and commonly called Sir William Somerville's Act, provided for the making of loans, under certain conditions, in order to the building of labourers' dwellings. That Act would expire next year, and it would probably be necessary in the course of the present Session to renew it, with certain alterations and improvements which had been suggested by experience. At the same time, he could give no definite pledge on the subject.

LOSS OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIP

"CAPTAIN."—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir James ELPHINSTONE,

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Papers relating to the loss of Her Majesty's Ship Captain had that night been laid on the Table of the House.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CARDWELL said: Sir, since we last met in this House to consider questions of military organization and military expenditure events have occurred in Europe of so marvellous a character that I think it no exaggeration to say they have no parallel in the records of history from the pages of Herodotus to those of Sir William Napier. These events have excited in the minds of the English people an anxious interest and a settled purpose to review their own military institutions, for the purpose of placing them on a basis of permanent security. The task which is before the English Parliament is not like that which was before the Prussian Legislature after the battle of Jena. We have no reverses to repair; and we do not begin upon a cleared foundation to build a new superstructure. Our more grateful, but not, perhaps, necessarily easier, task is to combine in one harmonious whole institutions which have great excellences, but which require considerable improvement in order to bring them up to the requirements of the time. There is the standing Army, with its historical associations and glorious memories, recruited by voluntary enlistment, and having a larger amount of foreign service than any other army in the world; there is the Militia, whose theory is conscription, but whose practice is voluntary enlistment; and there are the Volunteers, who have most of the attributes of military life, and all the independence of the most perfect civil freedom. To combine these different institutions in one complete whole is, as I believe, the desire of the House of Commons and of the English nation. Her Majesty's Government have thought the present opportunity favourable for accomplishing this object, because, while we have no dangers to apprehend, we have on the part of the community at large an interest in the subject which, in former years, it has been very difficult to evoke. And, Sir, it is the opinion of the Government that, if we are to deal at all with a question of this magnitude and importance, we ought not to deal with it in a superficial and partial manner, but ought to take a broad and comprehensive review of the subject, and endeavour to lay the deep foundations of a system which may render danger or the apprehension of danger in the future altogether unknown.

In endeavouring to discharge to the best of my ability the task imposed upon me I will first speak of the numbers of men for which the present Estimates provide, and next declare the views of Her Majesty's Government upon the great questions which underlie all the details of military administration, and which must be settled by Parliament before any Department can undertake, in a complete manner, the work of detailed organization. First, I shall speak with regard to the question of compulsory or voluntary service; then on the question of purchase in the Army; and, lastly, of the position of Lords Lieutenant of counties in regard to the auxiliary forces, with a reference to the relations which ought to subsist between the regular and the auxiliary forces of the country. And, perhaps, I may be permitted in the outset to quote some words of Mr. Pitt as being the natural and guiding principle for any Government in dealing with such a question as this. In 1803—at a time of great danger, very different from the present time—Mr. Pitt addressed to the House words which I think appropriate to a case like the present. He said—

“I am still of opinion that to a regular Army alone, however superior, however excellent, even aided by the Militia, we ought not solely to trust; but that in a moment so eventful. . . . We ought to superadd to the regular Army some permanent system of national defence, either to a certain degree compulsory, or formed upon the voluntary zeal and patriotism of the country itself. This ought to be resorted to as the grand source of domestic security. The Army must be the rallying point; the Army must furnish example, must afford instruction, must give us the principles on which that national system of defence must be formed, and by which the volunteer forces of this country, though, in a military view, inferior to a regular Army, would, fighting on their own soil for everything dear to individuals and important to a State, be invincible.”—

The present Estimates are, I am sorry to say, very much larger than those of last year. They amount to £15,851,700, being an increase of £2,886,700, or of £1,486,700 after taking into consideration the Vote of Credit assigned to the War Department, and amounting to £1,400,000. Over the Estimates of the preceding Government in 1868-9, after making an allowance for those Estimates on account of the Survey and some Indian payments—my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) well knows what I refer to—the increase is about £718,000. Now, with regard to fully £1,000,000 of the increase, I shall not occupy the time of the Committee with any details, because I think it will probably be desired that we should not now occupy ourselves with mere details, but proceed to the larger questions which are involved in the subject before us. All I will say is that my right hon. Friend who sits beside me, the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Sir Henry Storks), will be able, when the time comes, to show you that the £1,000,000 to which I have referred is an expenditure of a kind which will never occur in ordinary years. With regard to the increase of 20,000 men made last year, that accounts for an increase in the Estimates of £1,049,000. The increase for the Militia is £412,000; for Volunteers, £81,500; and for the Army Reserve, £61,000.

Before I pass on to other subjects I should like to say, almost in a single sentence, a few words about the increase of men. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) spoke the other evening of disbanded veterans and attenuated regiments. We disbanded no corps of the British establishment proper, but only colonial corps, and I maintain that it is almost a universally accepted principle of English policy that colonial corps shall not be maintained at the expense of the taxpayer at home. The doctrine is that at home the population shall do more in its own defence in comparison with the amount of the standing army, and that it is no longer necessary to maintain, at the expense of the British taxpayer, a standing army to relieve our distant Colonies from the necessity of doing anything to defend themselves. And there is no one who has more clearly or more forcibly expressed that opinion than my right hon. Friend whom I see opposite (Sir Charles Adderley), who represented the Colonial Office under the late Government. I contend, therefore, that when we disbanded the Canadian Rifles, who defended the frontier between the United States and Canada, we did nothing to impair the defensive power of England, nor did we do anything to diminish that power when we disbanded the Cape Rifles, on the report of the Governor of the Colony that the mounted police would do the work better; and the same remark may apply to the West India regiments and to the black troops on the West Coast of Africa, neither of whom afforded any source of strength to England. These disbandings lighten the burden of the British taxpayer, while they in no respect diminish the power or the influence of this country.

Then with regard to attenuated regiments. The first person who introduced attenuated regiments was, I think, General Peel, acting as a member of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. That was, in my opinion, a most judicious and wise course, and let me take the liberty of saying that if you are ever to have a combination of efficiency with economy, you must, in a time of peace, have attenuated regiments. Such regiments do not look so well on parade; they are not so agreeable to commanding officers as regiments which are not attenuated, but they are very agreeable to the British taxpayer, and when you have them backed by a reserve they are equally conducive to the strength and power of the country. General Peel did not reduce those regiments below 600; that was at a time when the reserves were not yet formed, the time when he introduced the Reserve Bill. We reduced them to 500; but that was at a time when the reserves were raised and were ready to be put into the battalions. I will for a moment make a comparison in order to show our exact strength when we came into Office with what it was when this subject was dealt with last year. I am taking a comparison certainly not too favourable to myself, for the right hon. Gentleman had at that time at home rather more men than his distribution had provided, while in August last I had fewer than my distribution contemplated. In December, 1868, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) had in this country 89,080 regulars, and 3,494 reserve men liable to service abroad. That left at home 92,574. On the 1st of August, 1870, we had only in this country of regulars 84,376—not because the Estimates did not provide more, but because 5,000 had not yet returned from the Colonies; but there was at that time a reserve of 22,313 men, making a total of 106,689, against 92,574. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Chiefly Militia Reserves.] Yes, they were; that is to say, there were at home liable to serve abroad 14,000 more men after the Estimates had been reduced by two millions and a quarter. I say, therefore, the policy of attenuated regiments is a policy to which I am prepared to adhere when there are reserves prepared to fill those regiments.

Well, now about Militia Reserves. I have never been enthusiastic for Militia Reserves; but I own I cannot understand why special disparagement should be cast on a Militia Reserve from the quarter that carried the Bill for establishing it, and actually created it. If it was not a reliable reserve, why create it? If it is a liable reserve, why disparage it? My own opinion is, that you may have a much better reserve—namely, the Army Reserve. It was for the purpose of securing that object that I introduced and carried through Parliament last Session a Bill for short service, which I hold to be at the very root and foundation of all Army Reform. Having used the reserves which my predecessors had placed in my hands, and having passed a Bill for the purpose of introducing a better reserve, I consider myself entitled to adhere to and sustain the policy of attenuated regiments in a time of peace.

Now I should like to say a few words upon the subject of recruiting, about which I have been asked a Question in the course of the evening, because, to my great surprise, all through the Recess, some patriotic critics appeared to have taken special trouble to prove that our attempts at recruiting were failures. What possible satisfaction that could give to any person who had the strength or glory of his country at heart I could never understand. But let me state a few of the facts of the case. I have laid on the Table the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting. The recruiting began in the middle of the harvest. It began without bounty, and I beg leave to remind the House that until last year it was an almost universally accepted dogma that recruiting without bounty was impossible. Well, we began recruiting without bounty, and almost immediately the occasion arose which led us to ask, and the House to vote, 20,000 additional men. The result has been that there was a larger number of recruits than during the time of the Crimean War, and even during the time of the Indian Mutiny, which has always been looked upon as the period when the greatest number of recruits were raised; and when a bounty of £2 was given and the medical examination was relaxed, the number did not greatly exceed that which we have now obtained. When you look at the bounty, the standard of height, and the medical examination, you will probably be of opinion, when you read the Inspector General's Report, that the recruiting of last year was really and substantially equal to that of 1857. Before I pass from the subject of bounty, I will observe that the system of bounty carried along with it the supposed necessity for the practice of marking. Bounty having been done away with, I have desired that the practice of marking may also be discontinued. [Murmurs.] I thought everybody in the House knew what marking was. Marking is the practice of imprinting letters upon the person in the way sailors frequently mark themselves. The letter "D." is put upon a deserter; the letters "B. C." upon one who has been guilty of very bad conduct. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Branding.] It is not branding. It is still sometimes said that we entrap and decoy recruits; but when you read the Report you will find that the recruits are sent without escort, a railway ticket being given to them at the places where they are recruited. They are sent by themselves to join their regiments; and a very small decimal represents the percentage of those who absent themselves, and that of these many afterwards join, having only missed a steamer, or a train. On the whole, I am sure you will feel that the recruiting has been extremely satisfactory.

On the question of short service, I wish to say that the numbers recruited under the Bill of last year are small, but that this may be accounted for by the operation of the prejudice which has always favoured the old plan, and because until the ranks of the Army were full we were not able to pass any men into the Reserve. The ranks of the Army are now full, or nearly so, and in a short time we shall begin to pass men into the Reserve. One of the objects of the measure I have to introduce will be that greater elasticity may be given in regard to short service than we were able to obtain by the Bill of last year. The House will remember that we had a great deal of discussion upon the subject. We were almost compelled to apply it only to the infantry, and that only for six years; but the war which has been raging on the Continent has shown abundantly that excellent soldiers can be made in a much shorter period than six years; and therefore I hope the House will permit us to extend the short-service principle to a much greater length, and thus to increase the Army Reserve.

I now wish to speak of the Militia, called, and justly called, by the Royal Commission "the solid and constitutional reserve of the country." We issued a circular to the commanding officers of the Militia regiments, in order to ascertain whether, in their opinion, they would be able to raise additional battalions or additional companies, and the result has been that we have received accounts which I have laid on the Table and which appear to show that we can raise 45,000 additional men in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Therefore, for the present year, there will be, including officers and permanent staff, 139,000 Militiamen. This is more than the statute at present permits us to raise; and one of the clauses of the Bill I shall have the honour to introduce will have for its object to enable the Crown to raise those additional Militiamen by voluntary enlistment within the limits of the Vote that Parliament may sanction.

The Volunteers have in the course of the year shown an increase of efficient to the number of 577, and of extra-efficient to the number of 8,176. The schools of instruction opened in the course of the autumn have been very readily attended, considering that they have been opened for so short a period, and at the present moment out of 460 men, 142 have passed the schools, and 318 have received certificates of competency. In the Estimates I have taken £40,000 for the Volunteers, in anticipation of the certificates to be obtained by officers, commissioned, and non-commissioned, in the present year. This arrangement made last year was not received at first with much favour by those who spoke about it in this House; but I hope those Volunteer officers who are present will agree with me in opinion that they have been received favourably by the Volunteer Force.

I will now pass on to state the numbers for which we propose to provide. The present Estimate provides on the British establishment for 135,047 Regular troops, 139,000 Militia, 14,000 Yeomanry (9,000 whom we hope to get for the First Army Reserve), and 30,000 Second Army Reserve and Pensioners, making in all 327,047 men, and if you add for efficient Volunteers 170,671, the whole will amount to 497,718. Of these there will be in this country 108,108 Regulars, 139,000 Militia, 14,000 Yeomanry, the First Army of Reserve amounting to 9,000, and the Second Army of Reserve and Pensioners to 30,000, making a total of 300,108, besides 170,000 Volunteers. And now I will just state how the 20,000 men added to the Army are disposed of.

The artillery has been increased by 5,254 men, the cavalry corps by 1,888, the infantry by 12,257, the engineer train by 333, the army service corps by 319, the army hospital corps by 140, making in all 20,191. Deducting from this 211 men, mainly consisting of two companies of the Ceylon Rifles, which are to be reduced, the number will be 19,980. Now, for this force of 300,108 men, which I said we shall have at home, one of the most important questions is—What is to be the field artillery? We have raised the horse artillery from 10 batteries to 16, having 96 guns; and we have turned 20 garrison batteries into field batteries, making 40 altogether, with 240 guns, making a total of 336 guns. And in reserve we have 12 batteries, with 72 guns, making in all 408 field guns, which would be a sufficient number of guns for a force of 150,000 men. I think it right to state these figures, partly because the subject is one which excites great interest, and partly because it is a necessary introduction to the first question which I wish to lay before the House—that is, the question of voluntary or compulsory service. Until we have clear ideas whether we mean to adhere to our present system of voluntary service, or to adopt some one of the many plans of compulsory service which we see daily presented to us, we cannot proceed with any detailed arrangements. Now, the question is not whether compulsory service shall be, as it has always been, a portion of the law of the country, not whether it shall be that last resource which the Sovereign and Parliament can apply in the moment of supreme emergency, but the question is, as we see every day recommended, whether compulsory service shall be called into action and become part of the daily administration of our military system. Sir, before enforcing a plan like this we should require indeed conclusive proof—something which should compel us to change our ancient habits and enter upon a course which, to my judgment, would be most distasteful to the country, and extremely objectionable in every point of view. It is sometimes said that compulsory service would be simple and logical, that it would solve all difficulties, and that if you only had recourse to it all the objections which surround it would at once disappear.

That argument seems to me to involve that there should be compulsory service for the standing Army, a proposition which nobody ever, I think, was bold enough to support. If it is to be compulsory service for the Militia, on what ground is it to be defended? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) in 1852 brought in the plan, which works extremely well, of voluntary enlistment for the Militia. Why depart from it and establish a compulsory system? I have seen it argued that it would be a great moral advantage if all men of all classes were compelled to serve together in the ranks under pressure of an Act of Parliament. To me it appears that there is not a nobler spectacle than this country presents, where all classes serve together, but serve together in a voluntary service, and have always hitherto in our time maintained a sufficient force. Before the Great War the theory of compulsory service existed, and what was the result? Why that almost all the persons who served were substitutes. And what was the result of that in its bearing, whether upon the individuals selected or upon the country at large? To the rich it was simply unqualified injustice. A rich man who was struck by the Ballot simply paid out of his own purse a large sum when he ought to have contributed only his portion as one of the community. What was it to the poor? From the poor man you took everything he possessed, his capital, his labour, his time, which was his only capital. And what was it for the State? By raising the price of the substitute in the market you enhanced the price of your recruit for the Army; you were bidding against yourself, you defeated your own measure, and you were absolutely obliged to give it up. Well, Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to recommend that there shall be compulsory service, whether with substitutes or without them. They agree entirely with the language used the other day by Lord Derby at a meeting in Lancashire, where he said—"You would find it the cheapest in the end to pay for the labour which you want." I have gone into the subject and expressed my views upon it at some length; but so much has been said about it for the last few months that I wished to express clearly and strongly the opinions which

I entertain. They are so well put in a Report upon recruiting by the late Mr. John R. Godley, that I cannot do better than quote his words. Mr. Godley wrote—

“Conscription, which is, at first sight and superficially, a cheap mode of recruiting armies, is, in reality, the most expensive that can be adopted. It is a tax by lot, confessedly the very worst kind of tax that a Government can impose. Where substitutes are allowed and provided, the tax is paid in money, and consists of the price paid for the substitute; the only difference between such substitutes and recruits provided as ours are being, that in the former case the bounty is paid by the unfortunate individual on whom the lot has fallen; in the latter case by the public. The case is still harder with those who cannot afford to purchase substitutes; on them the conscription is a tax which takes at one swoop their whole capital—i.e., their labour and their time. It matters not what the value of that capital may be—whether they be skilled or unskilled, educated or ignorant, earning high or low wages, producing largely or producing nothing, down comes the relentless conscription, takes possession of them for the best part of their lives, and gives them in return hardly more than clothing and food. In these cases the pecuniary amount of the tax is represented by the difference between the value of the conscript's labour at his calling and his pay as a soldier. But no pecuniary expression can represent the full amount of individual suffering and public inconvenience which must be the result of so extensive and violent a dislocation of labour. Compulsory service of any kind would be peculiarly injurious to a country inhabited by an enterprising and colonizing people like the English. Such a people always sits loosely to the soil, and the prospects of a conscription would infallibly lead to a regular and large immigration of our best workmen, a class of whom we already lose too many. Of course, if there is no other way of getting an army, we must have a conscription; but surely everything else ought to be tried before we have recourse to it.”

Well, it appears to me also that everything else ought to be tried before we adopt this system. We do not employ conscription even for the Navy, our first line of defence. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge based his Militia Bill on the voluntary principle, and I hope that in ordinary times we shall be able to secure a sufficient force without departing from that principle. In cases of emergency the law imposes the obligation of compulsory service; but it is not enforced in a manner which can be said to be either very efficient or simple. We, therefore, propose to insert in the Bill clauses empowering the Sovereign in times of emergency to call Parliament together, and to raise, without delay, the forces which may be deemed to be necessary under such circumstances for the national defence. Well, if we can have a force sufficiently large in all ordinary times by means of voluntary service, and if we supplement that force in cases of emergency by having recourse to the common-law obligation of every man to defend his country, the next question which arises is—How are these forces to be organized? When you come to consider this subject, you will find that there are two great questions which must be decided before you can enter into details. These are the questions of purchase in the Army, and the position of the Lords Lieutenant of counties with reference to the auxiliary forces. I believe it to be the desire of the country and of Parliament to unite and amalgamate all the different forces of the nation into one harmonious and compact body, so that they may be employed with the greatest advantage for the purpose for which they exist. In order to effect that object you must place them under one government, and in order to place them under one government you must apply to them something like the same rules and the same system. You cannot have the purchase officers of the Army amalgamated and interchangeable with the non-purchase officers of the reserve forces. You cannot have all your forces amalgamated and interchangeable so long as you retain a system under which at present the regular forces are under the direct government of the Crown, and the auxiliary forces under the control of the Lords Lieutenant of counties. Therefore it is that you must make up your minds as to whether you will continue or abolish the system of purchase, and whether you will keep your reserve forces in the hands of the Lords Lieutenant or transfer them to the Crown.

Now, with the permission of the Committee, I will take the question of purchase first. Everybody knows that the practice of purchase is co-existent with the existence of our Army. It was prohibited by William III. for a short time; but it was revived in 1701, and in 1711 rules, and in 1719 regulations, with respect to it were made. In 1857 a Royal Commission was appointed, of which the Duke of Somerset was Chairman, and by which many distinguished men were examined with respect to the question of purchase. The Commissioners, in their Report, sum up all that is to be said against and for the system with judicial impartiality. On the one side they say—

“It is contended that it is vicious in principle, repugnant to the public sentiment of the present day, and equally inconsistent with the honour of the military profession and with the policy of the British Empire. The system it is moreover affirmed produces ill effects on the constitution of the Army, and impairs its efficiency by giving an undue pre-eminence to wealth, discouraging exertion, and depressing merit.

“It encourages habits of expense and dissipation, injurious to discipline and embarrassing to the poorer officers.

“It sends an officer into battle with the knowledge that in hazarding his life, he hazards also the future prospects of those who are dearest to him.”

This, indeed, has been since the Crimean War modified as regards the regulation, but still remains as regards the over-regulation price. The Report proceeds—

“The regulation price of commissions is a fiction. . . . Cases of this kind lead to traffic and bargaining among officers, whereby a mercenary feeling, it is alleged, is created in men whose guiding principles should be a nice sense of honour and a disinterested attachment to the public service.”

Now it is impossible to conceive anything more alien from the feelings of that noble profession, whose object is not the acquisition of wealth but the discharge of duty and the attainment of honour, than the qualities which are spoken of in that Report of the Duke of Somerset's Commission. They may truly say—

Such outward things dwell not in their desires :
But if it be a sin to covet honour,
They are the most offending souls alive.”

On the other side, the Commission reported that the feeling of the Army was generally in favour of the continuance of the system of purchase, on the ground that it facilitated retirement, and was a security against favour. The Commission pointed out that the command of a battalion was a most important trust, and that no man, unless there was reason to believe he was thoroughly competent, ought to have the lives of his fellow-subjects committed to his charge. They showed that the loss of a battalion, the result of his incapacity, might be the loss of a battle, and the loss of a battle serious disaster to the Empire. They therefore recommended that, at least with regard to the command of a battalion, the system of purchase should be abolished. We are now in the fourteenth year since that recommendation was made. In 1860 it was taken into consideration by the Cabinet of Lord Palmerston, and it was determined to adopt it. We are now in the eleventh year since that decision was arrived at, and nothing has been done, and no wonder: for, in the first place, it was almost equally applicable to the major, and, in the next, the abolition of purchase in the case of the lieutenant-colonel must affect the interests of every officer in the regiment. Again, in 1868, my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), whom I see opposite, submitted to the Queen that it was advisable to do away with the rank of cornet and ensign in the Army. He did not, however, remain in Office long enough to devise and submit to Parliament a scheme on the subject. That task fell to me, and I endeavoured to discharge it to the best of my ability. I took the advice of some of the most experienced soldiers in the Army with respect to it, and I had every reason to believe that the plan which I proposed would be satisfactory until I announced it in this House. A more dismal reception than it then met with—a more universal rejection never in my recollection fell to the lot of any proposal made within these walls. What was the cause? It was that while I was asking Parliament to make a considerable contribution of the public money for a purpose which I believe was admitted to be advantageous to the Army, I had omitted to provide for the case of over-regulation prices, and yet I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not say that he would have proposed a Vote for the over-regulation price. That rendered it necessary to have an inquiry, for, although everybody knew what over-regulation prices were, except those who were responsible, yet everyone who was responsible was obliged to be entirely ignorant. The Royal Commission which was appointed consisted of the most eminent men, many of them being Members of this House, and at the head of it was my right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey). They reported unanimously, and I think I may, without fear of contradiction, say that their Report was strongly in favour of over-regulation prices. Now, statutes more stringent than those prohibiting over-regulation prices it is impossible to conceive. We have, therefore, Acts of Parliament prohibiting that in favour of which a Royal Commission has reported. The conclusion I draw from that is, that Earl Grey was not far wrong when he told the Duke of Somerset that the wisest thing we could do was to let purchase alone until we could abolish it altogether. Having those Acts of Parliament to which I have just referred on the statute book, are we to enforce those stringent penalties, notwithstanding the Report? Are we to leave them on the statute book, and fail to enforce them? Are we to repeal them, and declare that we have no control whatsoever over the system of purchase? Are we to say that there is to be no protection for the officers who cannot afford to meet the rise in price, so that, in fact, the obtaining commissions shall be simply a question of the highest bidder? ["No, no!"] But it would be so when you repealed the Act of Parliament. We are, therefore, brought by two classes of considerations to the absolute necessity of considering the subject. You can decide in favour of maintaining the purchase system or in favour of abolishing it. But under the circumstances of the nation at the present time you are compelled by irresistible necessity to come to a fixed and settled determination. You want to introduce a reform which, probably, will involve a complete change in the organization of your Army; you have heard or read of the Prussian system, and are considering, perhaps, whether, in some respects, it might not be advisable to adopt some portions of that system; and you cannot stir without interfering with pecuniary interests in a manner which you would regret, or without creating new pecuniary interests which you have no right to do until Parliament has made up its mind on the subject. I say you are compelled to come to a decision on this subject. Now, what is this decision to be? The arguments on the side of retaining the purchase system are strong, and the first is that you will have to pay a very large price if you wish to abolish it. If you decide in favour of this course, and if you accept the recommendations of my right hon. Friend, as I, for one, think you will be obliged to do, and recognize to the full the customary price of commissions, the amount in the purchase regiments will not be less than £7,500,000, and may run up to nearly

£8,500,000, as will be seen from the calculations which I shall lay upon the Table of the House by-and-by. Well, that is a very large sum. But there are other difficulties still greater. What will you do about retirement? It is impossible to determine with accuracy what will be required in the way of retirement. The Duke of Somerset's Commission reported that to do away with the system of purchase you must introduce these two principles—selection and compulsory retirement. I am not able to tell you what retirement will be necessary—no one, indeed, but a prophet could tell you that. It must be tried by experience before you can come to any result. There are those who believe that, if purchase was abolished, many men would send their sons into the Army for the benefit of the training, to leave it after a short interval, and that promotion would, therefore, be as rapid as it is now. They would say, why should I be less willing to send my son into the Army when I have no commission to pay for, and when the Army would be a better school? I confess I do not agree with that opinion, and believe that we should have more retirement to provide. Another possible conclusion might be arrived at, and that is that in the reserve forces we hope to be able in future to find many places for officers of the regular service. How far that would furnish the retirement without putting the country to the expense of providing retirements no person can possibly predict. It is a question which you must look forward to face when it arises, and all you can say is that the charge, if it does arrive, will be a necessary and a legitimate charge, and that Parliament must be prepared to meet it. But there remains another difficulty, and that is, how promotion is to be regulated. The Royal Commission say—and I think with truth—that you would do harm in the Army if, in abolishing purchase, you substituted seniority, pure and simple. I believe the truth is that, if you abolish purchase, you must accept the principle of selection. You must act upon the principle of selecting for promotion those who merit it, and you must not allow inert or inefficient seniority or a system of pecuniary advantage to prevail. Well, then, the question is, are you prepared to meet these three objections?—Are you prepared to sacrifice a very large sum of money? Are you prepared to look forward to dealing with the question of retirement? and are you prepared to adopt the principle of selection? Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered all these questions. They are of opinion that unpaid service is very generally the dearest of services. They are of opinion that this system of trafficking and purchase in this glorious profession ought to cease, and they therefore recommend to the House the abolition of the purchase system. The Bill which I shall have the honour of laying upon the Table of the House will explain the mode by which it is proposed to carry this into effect. After a certain date no pecuniary interest shall be taken by anyone in any new commission, and no man shall be placed in a worse position as to the commission he at present holds in respect to either regulation or customary price. Commissioners will be appointed, who will at once ascertain the over-regulation price in every regiment, and with money from the Votes of Parliament they will stand in the place of purchasers. When, therefore, an officer retires by the sale of his commission, he will receive from the Commissioners both the regulation and the customary price of his commission. I use the phrase "customary price" because it is the most accurate legal definition of the money paid in excess of the regulation value. When an officer retires on full pay or half-pay, and proves that but for the abolition of the purchase system he would have received the over-regulation price of his commission, the amount will be paid him; and when he wants to sell his half-pay commission, and is permitted to commute it, and proves that but for the passing of this Act he would have been eligible to sell, whether by exchange or otherwise, he will receive from the Commissioners the difference between the regulation price and the commutation. An officer, again, having on the appointed day a claim by years of service to a price higher than that of his present commission, and afterwards promoted, will receive the price, if subsequently promoted, out of the regulation price of the higher commission—that is to say, the Bill recognizes the vested interest of a non-purchase officer, as it recognizes the vested interest of the purchase officer. The Act also contains a clause which provides that claims to compensation in the old Indian regiments shall be considered by the Commissioners according to the recognition which has been given to such claims by the Secretary of State for India. At present, of course, only those officers can sell who can find purchasers; and in framing a measure of this kind in a spirit of great liberality it is necessary to fix some limit; or, if you make the Consolidated Fund the universal purchaser, there is no saying how rapidly the process might go on, and after some time you might observe that a very great diminution had been made in your Army, and some considerable diminution in your Consolidated Fund. Therefore the limit we have fixed is this—that no greater number of officers shall retire in any year than the maximum number of that rank and branch of the service in any of the preceding five years, without the sanction of the Treasury. I believe that no case has been omitted from the draft of the Bill. I shall lay the computations upon the Table of the House, and, as hon. Members will see, it will vary from £7,600,000 at the least to £8,400,000 at the most. Of course it will not all occur at once. It will be a considerable charge for the first few years, after which it will rapidly decline, and become comparatively small.

The next important question that arises is as to first commissions. If the House should adopt the scheme of the Government the first commissions will, of course, be given without purchase, and therefore it is necessary to consider what is the proper and legitimate way for the public to bestow that which it is intended to give as a free gift. We propose that the first commissions shall be given in one of several ways. First, that admission to Sandhurst shall be by competitive examination, as recommended by the Royal Commission on Military Education; and that those who have obtained admission to Sandhurst by competitive examination should receive commissions, provided they were found to conduct themselves in such a manner as to entitle them to the position; that a certain number of subalterns of Militia regiments who have served for two years in the Militia regiments and have received favourable testimonials should be granted commissions without purchase in the Line. Non-commissioned officers, of course, as now, should obtain commissions; and considering that one of the consequences of this proposal would be to abolish the rank of cornet and ensign, it is necessary to consider whether it would not be expedient to institute an order of cadets. The Royal Commission on Military Education recommended that there should be garrison instructors and regimental instructors in the regiments. We have carried into effect the proposal as regards garrison instruction to great advantage; and when you have extended it to regimental instructors, it is at least a question whether it would not be of great advantage that young men should enter the regiments as cadets under the regimental instructors before they received their commissions. If this were done the commissions could be withheld in the case of young men who found, upon trial, either that they did not like the service or that the service did not like them. Then, of course, there would be the University men, who now are qualified for commissions, and those commissions to which these several sources did not furnish candidates would be filled from the general public by competitive examination. These are the modes by which it is proposed admission to the Army should be gained on the abolition of purchase.

Then we come to the question of promotion, and if we adopt the opinion of the Royal Commission of 1857 we must decide that promotion be made by selection. But of all the problems of life none is so difficult of solution as to decide in whose hands the power of selection should reside, and by what rule that power should be exercised. One thing, however, is quite certain; we shall all agree that the administration of the patronage of the Army should not be placed in the hands of a political party. That is a point upon which the Committee of which Sir James Graham was Chairman expressed the strongest opinion. At present the responsibility rests upon the Secretary of State for War, and I do not think he should be relieved of that responsibility. If an improper appointment be made, the person who should be responsible to the Crown and the country is the Secretary of State; but the selection of the person destined for promotion should not rest with him, but with a high military officer, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. To secure fairness of promotion, the reports of general officers inspecting will be furnished in greater completeness to the General Commanding-in-Chief, and be tabulated and recorded in the office of the Military Secretary. These will form the basis for selection according to the regulations about to be laid down; but I will not enter into details upon the mode in which security is to be afforded to the Army for the impartiality and fairness of promotion, because the matter is still being carefully considered by some of the most eminent officers in the Army; and I must render my thanks to Sir William Mansfield for the assistance he has been good enough to give me upon this subject, in conjunction with his Royal Highness the Field Officer Commanding-in-Chief. Speaking generally, promotion from subaltern to captain would be regimental, and, speaking generally, promotion from captain to major and from major to lieutenant-colonel would be army promotion. First appointments to the rank of major and lieutenant-colonel would be limited in point of time, so that those whom experience proved to be inefficient, and whom it would not be desirable to re-appoint, at the expiration of some limited period—say, five years—would not be re-appointed. There should likewise be a limit of age. I believe this is very much the system that prevails in the Prussian Army, where it is attended with this consequence—that when a man finds that he is not selected, he naturally discovers he is not wanted and leaves the service. It is, in fact, a system designed to sift out those failing through defect in character, health, conduct, or intellect to come up to the proper standard of military excellence; it will not prejudicially affect officers of average ability and zeal, nor will it operate to elevate juniors far above their seniors, except in cases of very extraordinary merit. But you will observe that there is one important consideration at the root of this part of the question—namely, that if you do not retain selection at every part of the system, you will immediately find, as soon as you have spent a large sum of money in abolishing one system of purchase, you have laid the foundation of another. The security against the growth of another system of purchase is first a rigid enforcement of the law. If Parliament consents to make this great contribution towards the abolition of purchase, Parliament will not be satisfied without its enforcement. The next principal consideration will be, that the successor shall never be known until his predecessor has left his place; and the third is that, wherever there is the slightest suspicion that any corrupt pecuniary arrangement has formed the basis of retirement, selection shall be vigorously exercised to put it aside. With regard to the rapidity of promotion after the change is made, it is impossible, at the present moment, to say more than that changes will occur after the passing of the Bill, and those who take positions in the Army must be prepared to accept those positions on that understanding, with the knowledge that a reasonable rapidity of promotion will be secured probably much the same as the average of past years. Then, Sir, in whose hands are these large powers to be vested? The answer is—they will be vested in the officer who is chosen by the Government of the Sovereign to be Commander-in-Chief of the Army, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for War. Hitherto there have been two offices from which military affairs have been administered—that of the Secretary of State for War in Pall Mall, and that of the officer commanding-in-chief at the Horse Guards. It is not easy to exaggerate the inconvenience arising from the separation of these two offices. That inconvenience was commented upon by Sir James Graham's Committee more than 10 years ago, and it is, I believe, universally admitted; but physical obstacles have hitherto prevented our overcoming this inconvenience. It is the desire of everyone, I believe, that, if possible, a new building should be ultimately erected upon the historical site where the Horse Guards now stands; but we have never been able to obtain the means of carrying that into effect, and even if we had the site to-morrow it would probably be something like 10 years before the design could be accomplished. Hitherto there has been no room for the two establishments in either one of these buildings; but last year a very considerable reduction in the establishments of both was made, and now we shall be able to accommodate under the roof of the War

Office in Pall Mall the officer commanding-in-chief and all that belongs to the principal establishment of the Horse Guards. The next question is, what is to be the tenure of the officer commanding-in-chief and the Military Secretary? Perhaps I may be allowed to say, in passing, that I have seen with very great regret a good deal of comment made on this subject, which seemed to me to have had a personal character. I shall therefore make no further allusion to this fact, lest, by doing so, I should be myself the unwilling instrument of importing matter of that description into the discussion, matter which I am persuaded it would be the wish and the duty of both sides of the House to avoid. With regard to these two offices, Her Majesty's Government have considered that the position of the officer commanding-in-chief must be looked upon as an exceptional one as compared with that of any other Staff officer, and that, therefore, it cannot be regulated with mere reference to time. It is obvious that he should be in harmony with the Government of the day, and that his continuance in, and removal from, office must depend upon considerations of public policy; and Her Majesty's Government therefore think that it would be a mistake to apply to the person holding that office a condition derived from the mere limit of time. But with regard to the post of Military Secretary, which is now exempt from the five years' rule that applies to other Staff officers, I think there is no reason for the exemption, and that it ought to be rescinded. Our object should be to secure the greatest exactness and the greatest impartiality in regard to every officer in the Army; and the intention is that promotion should rest upon the selection of the officer who may be commanding-in-chief, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for War. I have now, I think, exhausted—I am afraid at too much length—what I have to say on the difficult question of purchase. I do not say that we have devised a theoretically perfect plan; but, after balancing the matter with the best judgment I have been able to bring to bear upon it, I do earnestly recommend our proposal to this House as being the one surrounded with the smallest difficulties; and I do not see how you can achieve any complete organization in this country of an army combining the regular with the auxiliary forces until you have abolished the system of purchase in the Regular Army.

Then, with respect to the auxiliary forces, in 1869 we obtained power from Parliament to place the Militia, when out for training, under the command of the general officer of the district, and in 1870 we divided our military districts into sub-districts, under the command of general officers; and that arrangement, as far as I can understand, works to the satisfaction of the officers of the Militia. I believe they prefer that amount of union with the regular service, and to be placed under the general officer of their district. But we have now in these Estimates included a colonel on the Staff for every one of these sub-districts, who will have under him between 15,000 and 20,000 of the auxiliary forces of the country; and we propose to make him a kind of brigadier, or commander of the whole force, in order that the regular and auxiliary forces may be more closely compacted and united together. The Inspector General of Reserve Forces, after a study of the reports of the inspecting officers, tells me, I am happy to say, that he thinks them satisfactory as regards these auxiliary forces. Yet I think it will be admitted by Gentlemen connected with them who sit in this House, that there has not been a sufficiently close inspection of them, and that if there were a more vigorous one, and it were known where to apply the pruning knife and to remove that which it was desirable to remove, that would greatly add to the efficiency of those forces. We, therefore, propose that there should be a colonel on the Staff of the regular Army for every 15,000 or 20,000 of the auxiliary forces in each district. Then we come to the question from whom should these auxiliary forces hold their commission; and this is a question which, at some periods of our history, was a great political consideration, but I think it has long ceased to be so. The opinion of Her Majesty's Government is, that the commissions now given by the Lords Lieutenant of the counties should in future emanate from the Queen. We propose, therefore, to transfer to, or to re-invest in, the Queen the issuing of these commissions, and to make the auxiliary forces—though of course recruited, enlisted, and embodied, when they are embodied, according to their own separate constitution and character—all hold from the Queen, all be under one command, and all be regarded as members of the general defensive and military system of the country. The promotions will all be made on the same principles as in the Regular Army, the Inspector General of the Reserve Forces being always consulted with respect to every promotion. In reference to first commissions, I should hope that the Lord Lieutenant of the county would give his recommendation, so that that most valuable element of the Militia Force—the county influence—may not be entirely got rid of. In communicating to the Militia a more military character, it is far from the desire of the Government to deprive it of any portion of that local character which we know to be so important.

Then, Sir, we come to the question—How we can give a greater local connection to the Regular Army? I have already said that the detailed organization of the forces cannot be completely undertaken, much less carried into effect, until Parliament has declared its purpose upon these great questions. Do you agree with the Government in thinking that in ordinary times we should look exclusively to voluntary service, and should not entertain the notion of compulsory service except in the case of a great emergency? When Parliament has come to its decision on that point, one important part of the problem will have been solved. The next question is—Do you approve the abolition of purchase in the Army? and the third question is—Do you approve of the transfer from the Lords Lieutenant of counties of the power which they now exercise of granting commissions in the auxiliary forces, that power being re-vested in the Crown? But in the meantime there are some means to which we may resort for establishing a closer connection between the regular and the auxiliary forces. The old principle of depôt battalions was much objected to on several grounds. It was costly; it was inefficient; it removed the officers from direct subordination to their commanding officers, and placed them under the commanding officers of the depôt battalions. Now it is proposed to establish training centres for the regular troops and the Militia upon the local principle. Each colonel on the Staff having from 15,000 to 20,000 of the auxiliary forces under him, would also have under him the whole recruiting service of his district; he would have the command of all the reserves, except the technical instruction of the artillery, which would be conducted under the officers of the Royal Artillery. The infantry regiments which have now a local designation would retain that designation, and be attached to the sub-district in which the county they belong to is included. Regiments not having a local designation will be assigned to a sub-district, regard being had to its population and recruiting power. Regiments will recruit in their own sub-districts. The permanent Staff of the Militia and the Volunteers will be utilized by the colonel on the Staff when the regiment is not out. Recruits for the Militia will be trained, as far as possible, with those for the Regular Army, and it is proposed to train them for a longer period than the period during which they are now trained, the object not being to extend the term of training the Militia—which would, generally speaking, be such a disturbance of the labour of the country that it could not be endured—but sending the recruits to be much better trained at first in order that they may not require a longer training after they have joined their regiments. The adjutants of the reserves should be frequently selected from captains on full pay of a regiment of the same district, and they should be appointed for five years, subject to renewal if specially recommended, being in the meantime supernumerary to their regiments. In that way a close connection would be established between the regular and the Militia regiments of the county. In like manner the permanent Staff of officers of the county regular regiment would frequently be lent to the Militia regiment during the period of training if it desired to receive it. The Militia Reserve of the sub-district would, as a general rule, in the event of war, be draughted to the regiments in the same sub-district, although, from the exigencies of the service, it might not be possible to do so in all cases. That is a sort of general outline of the mode in which it is proposed, under the colonels of the Staff, to unite more closely than ever was done heretofore the regular and the auxiliary forces of the country.

With regard to the Volunteers, the Volunteer Force is one for which I have always felt and expressed the greatest possible respect; and I think it is a noble spectacle to see the sacrifices of time and convenience which has been made by men who have no other desire than to serve their country. At the same time, I believe everybody sees that a much more careful organization of the Volunteer Force is necessary if it is to be made an integral part of our effective military system. Well, I think I may say for myself that we were the first to admit the principle that all necessary expenses for the Volunteers were to be paid by the State. We examined carefully what these necessary expenses were, and they amounted, after the best calculation we could make, to the sum that is now allowed—namely, to the power of earning 35*s.* per man per annum. But, inasmuch as one of the greatest deficiencies of the Volunteer Force has been the imperfect fitness of the officers for the discharge of the duties devolving upon them, we have thought the proper way of giving an additional capitation allowance would be not to scatter it broadcast over the whole body, but to give it in large sums to those officers and non-commissioned officers who go to schools of instruction, or who otherwise qualify themselves for the discharge of their duties, and we have taken an additional sum of £40,000 in these Estimates for the officers and non-commissioned officers who have qualified during the year. Further, we do not intend that any commanding officer of Volunteers shall hold at the same time two commissions; or, at least, if he does, one of them shall be a purely honorary commission, and shall not be in any way a substantive one, and we think that after a very limited period, every officer in the Volunteers may be expected to make himself thoroughly competent. Allowances have, for some time, been made to that most valuable force, the Artillery Volunteers, to enable some of their body to proceed to Shoeburyness for the purpose of receiving instructions, and those Members of this House who have read the Reports made by the Royal Artillery officers on the subject must have been struck by the great value which this training has had. We now propose to extend this system to the Rifle Volunteers, and to enable some of them to attend camps of instruction, a proceeding from which we expect much good to result. Speaking generally, we do not wish to lay down for the body of Volunteers any small and vexatious rules; but when there is a colonel of the Staff responsible for every 15,000 or 20,000 of the reserve forces, I am sure that the Volunteers themselves will be satisfied that we ought to strike off from the capitation grant all those corps, and all those Volunteers, of whom the colonel or the Staff is not able to report that they are really and actually efficient as defenders of their country. Some of the rules at present in existence do not appear to be of much benefit to the force. It is an anomaly that a man may be technically "efficient" as a rifleman without ever having been to the targets. It must appear reasonable that a man should be expected to make himself a rifleman before receiving the capitation grant. All that is now required to be done by a Volunteer to entitle him to a certificate granting capitation for extra efficiency is that he should fire 60 rounds, a feat which I have seen performed in little more than two minutes at Wimbledon, and, therefore, I think it would not be calling upon the Volunteers to make any excessive sacrifice if we ask them to submit to terms which will render them efficient for the service they have bound themselves to perform. It is one part of the Government plan to make arrangements for brigading the Regulars, Militia, and Volunteers more largely than has been the case in the past, and that being so, I have put a clause into the Bill, which I shall ask leave to introduce, providing that when Volunteers are out with the Regulars they shall be considered as being on actual military service, the meaning of which is that the Mutiny Act would apply to them. Another great difficulty with which we have had to contend in reference to the Volunteers has been the irregularity with which many of them attend to their duties. It seems to me unreasonable that when a flying column has been sent from Aldershot to Wimbledon to be present at a Volunteer Review, and when His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief or some officer of high rank in the Army has undertaken to go down and review the forces, it shall be a matter of uncertainty how many Volunteers will be present. This is a state of things we ought to take measures to remedy.

VOL. CCIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Again, under the Volunteer Act a Volunteer is exempt from the Ballot for the Militia, although he is allowed to leave the corps to which he belongs after a fortnight's notice. We do not propose to continue that exemption. There is a clause in the Bill which will enable the Volunteer's contract to be made for a longer period, and if the Ballot ever takes place at all those only will be exempted from it who have entered into a longer and more satisfactory engagement. I have, therefore, only to say, in conclusion, that if these arrangements are carried out, all the forces being under one command, and that command being exercised in every division by the general officer commanding, there will be under him colonels and lieutenant-colonels in charge of the auxiliary forces, and lieutenant-colonels of the Royal Artillery, especially for the Militia and Volunteer Artillery; the recruiting and training centres will be so managed that the regiments will have local names, and recruit in their own localities; and the Militia recruits will be trained with those of the Regular Army; and the adjutants and permanent Staff of the Militia will be under the control of high military officers.

I may now, perhaps, repeat to the Committee the forces to which we should have to look for the defence of the country if the proposals I have made were carried out, and all the branches of the service raised to a high standard of efficiency. There would be—field and horse artillery, 8,473; garrison artillery, 7,419; dépôt brigade and riding establishment, 2,852; Militia artillery, 15,854; and Volunteer artillery, 34,005, making a total of 68,603 artillerymen. There would be 12,952 cavalry and 14,000 yeomanry, amounting in all to 26,952. The engineers would number 3,949, and the Volunteers 6,280—in all, 10,229. Of infantry regulars there would be 69,181; of Militia, 123,146; total, 192,327; and of Volunteers, 130,386, making a total under that head of 322,713, to which must be added departmental corps 3,282, giving a grand total of 431,779; with the First and Second Class Army Reserve, 470,779. This force will be raised by voluntary enlistment, and may, by the Ballot, be still further increased in case of emergency. I have only to say besides that there is a question which I have before brought before the attention of the House—I mean the question of billeting, which is one of considerable interest. We do not know whether it is likely that in many counties or localities use will be made of such a provision—I have been told that in some cases it is likely, but on that I will offer no opinion; but we propose to give to any locality or localities the power to borrow money from the Treasury, at a reasonable rate of interest, and to take powers for the Secretary of State for War for pledging to the locality during the currency of the loan the annual sum voted by Parliament for the billeting of the regiments. We are on the best possible understanding at present with the railway companies; but I have thought it right to insert a clause which in case of emergency will enable the State to possess itself of the railways in the same way that it used to have power to possess itself of the telegraphs, so that the whole communications of the country might at once, in case of emergency, be made use of for military purposes. These are the principal features of the Bill which I shall have the honour to introduce.

A few words on one or two other points, and I have done. Some time ago I applied to my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to authorize me to say that the patronage of the Post Office, which has a great number of out-door employments suitable for pensioners and persons connected with the Army Reserve, might be used for the purpose of giving employment to such persons. I am authorized to say that, so far as is consistent with good service, it is intended to act upon the suggestion I made to my right hon. Friend.

The year just passed has seen many changes both at home and abroad. Her Majesty's Government has introduced the 35-ton gun, which is, I believe, the most powerful weapon known in the world; we have altered the field artillery and introduced the 16-pounder gun, which is of its kind the most powerful weapon known; and by changing the Snider for the Martini-Henri rifle we have prepared to arm our infantry with the best rifle known. One other incident of the year I think it right to mention. Amid so many great events the expedition which was sent to the Red River Settlement, in consequence of an insurrection in the territory, has been almost entirely lost sight of. It is due to those who took part in that expedition that they should have the credit of it. The expedition consisted of about 420 of the British Army and 750 Canadian Volunteers, acting in harmony together—a very agreeable circumstance. It involved a journey of 600 miles from Lake Superior over forests never hitherto traversed by a military force, and with intervening obstacles of the most serious kind, both by land and water. But all the difficulties were successfully overcome, and the troops, having accomplished their object, returned immediately to Canada, there being a total absence of crime and of sickness, every arrangement having previously been made to meet every difficulty. My hon. Friend the worthy Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), will rejoice to know that one of the reasons of this happy state of affairs was that spirits formed no part of the daily ration, and no intoxicating liquors were obtainable in that inhospitable country. But if the House will allow me, I should like to read one passage from the report from Sir Garnett Wolseley, who commanded the expedition, under the direction of Sir James Lindsay; and the reason why I wish to read it is this—that we are constantly told that the civil administration would be sure to break down whenever it was tried. But it is due to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington), who instituted that department, and to myself, and others who took part in promoting it, to state the successful manner in which it overcame the difficulties it had to encounter in this expedition. Colonel Wolseley says—

“As regards the civil administration I have to remark that the amalgamation of the many civil departments into one, that of the Control, was put upon its first practical trial in the field during this expedition, with the happiest results. I found that having all the civil officers available for any sort of duty connected with administration was a great economy of labour, and enabled the duties to be performed by a much smaller number than could have been done formerly, when, under similar circumstances, it would have been necessary to have had an officer of each department present at every post, and perhaps with each detachment of troops. A vast amount of useless correspondence is saved by the new system, and the administrative labour that must always more or less devolve upon an officer commanding a mixed force in the field is greatly reduced, and his work facilitated thereby, giving him much more time to attend to his important military duties.”

ment to Mr. Irvine, whom the Surveyor General had selected for this duty. That was the object, as I understood, the late Government had in view in instituting the department—that there should be a saving of useless correspondence, a saving of administrative labour, and that an officer commanding a mixed force in the field should have more time to attend to his important military duties. I think it due to all concerned to mention this expedition, and the success which attended it.

Now, Sir, I think I have concluded—I am conscious how very imperfectly—the arduous task I had undertaken. Her Majesty's Government call upon you, if you adopt their measures, for a great sacrifice; but if you make that sacrifice the objects we have in view are these—we ask you for no increase of the standing Army beyond that which you made at the end of last Session; but we propose to raise the Army Reserve as rapidly and largely as we can by the increased introduction of short service in the Army. We desire to pass as many men through the ranks as can be done having regard to the number of recruits and the time required to make a man an efficient soldier. We propose to increase the Militia, and to improve the organization of the Volunteers; to provide for compulsory service in case of emergency; to abolish purchase; to withdraw from Lords Lieutenant the power they have now in regard to the auxiliary forces; to combine the whole under general officers; to appoint colonels on the Staff in sufficient numbers to this Army; to combine recruiting for the Line with that of the Reserves; to fuse together as we can the Regular and Reserve Forces by appointing officers of the Regular Army to positions in the Reserve, and by giving subalterns in the Militia commissions in the Line. We propose to brigade them together, to find field artillery for all arms, to enable counties to get rid of the inconvenience of billets, to gain command of the railway communication of the country in case of emergency—in short, we propose to unite all the voluntary forces of the country into one defensive army, with power to supplement by compulsion in case of emergency—all to be under the command of the general officers commanding in the districts, subordinate to one Commander-in-Chief, who will act with the approval of the Secretary of State; and, therefore, the whole will be under the direction and supreme control of Her Majesty's responsible Ministers. I earnestly commend to your favourable consideration these proposals. You will at any rate agree that we have not attempted to glide over the surface and propose some mere superficial and partial arrangements. We have done our best to deal with the principles that lie at the bottom of the service, to lay, if you should be pleased to approve of the measures, the firm foundation of a defensive force, which may be a perfect security to the country not merely against danger, but against that which is scarcely less intolerable to the spirit and independence of Englishmen—the perpetually recurring apprehension of danger.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 135,047 Men (including an average number of 6,385 to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions), be maintained for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 1st day of April 1871 to the 31st day of March 1872, inclusive.”—(Mr. Secretary Cardwell.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am not about to follow the right hon. Gentleman through his long and elaborate statement. Indeed, in the present state of my voice it would be impossible to make myself heard. But I hope the House will not be called upon to pronounce prematurely an opinion on the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. I must also notice one point in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman where he rather mistook what fell from me. He spoke with some satisfaction as regards the Reserve at this moment compared with what it would be under his plan. I asked him whether he referred to the Militia Reserve, and he said he did. He seemed to suppose that I referred to the Militia Reserve with the intention of disparaging it; but I really had no such intention. I will not enter into a consideration of the subject at present; but will inquire what course the right hon. Gentleman intends to take with regard to the discussion.

MR. CARDWELL replied that he would for the present withdraw the Vote. The Bill would be in the hands of Members in a few days, and they would then be in a better position to consider the scheme.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MARRIAGE PORTION FOR HER ROYAL HIGHNESS.

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice—namely, "That the sum of £30,000 be granted to Her Majesty, for the Marriage Portion of Her Royal Highness Princess Louise Caroline Alberta," said, he would not now trouble the Committee with any observations, as this was part of the plan he announced the other evening, on which occasion he stated everything that was relative to the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the sum of £30,000 be granted to Her Majesty, for the Marriage Portion of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise Caroline Alberta."
—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he rose with reluctance—a reluctance, however, not proceeding from any doubt as to the propriety of the course he was about to pursue, nor from much fear at being in a minority, but because he felt that the position he took up would, without some explanation, be liable to misconstruction. Those who opposed the Vote did not desire to express disapproval of or to receive ungraciously the special act of the Queen in relation to the question at issue. So far as he had any communication with those large portions of the community out-of-doors who objected to the Grant, he had to say that the opposition did not arise from any want of sympathy with, or respect for, the course which Her Majesty had taken with reference to an alliance between a daughter of the Sovereign and a subject. The opponents of the Grant rather regarded that as a boon to the people of this country, and as a tendency towards the views and principles of the day, which were held out-of-doors; but they not the less felt that the boon lost all its grace if made the subject of barter and contract; and at a large meeting at Leicester a speech was made by a working man, who said that he was filled with admiration when he reflected on the fact that the Princess Louise had departed from the custom which had prevailed of allying the Royal Princesses to foreign

Princes. This was not a question of party politics, nor even of principles of government, for the professed admirers of monarchical institutions would admit that it was not wise to overweight them by unnecessary and extravagant expenditure; while others with different views would give their voice in favour of the Chief Magistrate of the country being maintained in a manner and position adequate to the dignity of the country. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government persisted in making this Motion after the manifestations which had been made of the opinions of large masses out-of-doors in disapproval of it. ["Oh, oh!"] There was no use in believing in delusions; there was a very bitter feeling out-of-doors on the subject; and he should have thought that the Government would have seen that the whole grace and decorum of such a proceeding as this depended on the spontaneous action in its favour of all classes of the community. ["Divide!"] It might be that the House would hear him, as the unworthy representative of the feeling of the nation, of some hundreds of thousands out-of-doors. He felt that the House of Commons had a perfect right to discuss the question in all its bearings. It had been hinted that there was a breach of faith in discussing this matter at all, because it was said, at the commencement of the reign the Crown Lands were given up to Parliament, and an equivalent was provided in the shape of the Civil List. He believed that was an inaccurate and unconstitutional statement of the fact; and he maintained there was no compact, contract, or bargain between Parliament and the Crown, except that the former would give to the Crown that which was due to its dignity and to the dignity of the nation. The right hon. Gentleman the other day carried his argument further than it could be carried, when he declared that the Crown had as an irrefragable right over the Crown Lands of the country as any private individual had over his own private property, a statement which would have been more correct if applied to the days of the Stuarts than to our own; but Sir George C. Lewis, on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal, declared that it had ever been deemed a matter of policy to strip the Crown of all hereditary property, and to make it dependent during life on Parliament. The House was told, also, of the enormous sum which might be realized by building in Hyde Park and the other Parks; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that a former Sovereign, in answer to an inquiry as to how much it would cost to enclose St. James's Park, was told that it would cost two Crowns. A right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) had said that dowries for the Royal family were part of the arrangement under which the Civil List was granted. What was the date of that arrangement, and what were the particulars of it? Why was the Committee discussing this question if such an arrangement existed? The fact was notorious that no arrangement of the kind did exist, and that such dowries had always been the subject of Acts of Parliament. There was a prevalent feeling amongst large classes of the people of this country that the expenses of our monarchical establishments were far too heavy, and they thought that a fair proportion of the Supplementary Grants continually being asked for on behalf of the Crown should come out of the Civil List. In that opinion he coincided. He found that, in 1869, the expenses of the Monarchy, including the Civil List, the Duchy of Lancaster, and other payments amounted to £456,000, and adding various Grants to other Members of the Royal Family, the amount was £637,000, not including the sums paid by way of dowry. It was replied that the sum received by former Monarchs in this country was higher than that received by the Queen. Hon. Members, however, must remember that the money formerly paid to the Crown was not so purely applicable to the personal demands as it now was; Queen Anne having devoted considerable sums towards the support of the war, the building of Blenheim, and other purposes, while George I. gave £100,000 towards the support of his heir. Then it was said that the income of some Continental Sovereigns was larger than our own. He should decline to draw any such comparisons; but if the Queen's income must be compared with that of any other Sovereign, it should be compared with the income of the Ruler of the great nation across the Atlantic, sprung from the same race as ourselves, and then the difference between £600,000 and £5,000 a year was rather striking. Under ordinary circumstances he should not think it right suddenly to make a change, without any previous warning, in a practice on the faith of the continuance of which arrangements might possibly have been made. But there were peculiar circumstances in this case. Hereafter the rule could not be pleaded. Any future case must be decided upon its own merits, and the plea that a change of practice was unexpected would no longer be a valid one. He was of opinion that Her Majesty did not derive her Civil List as occupying the Throne by divine right; but by the much higher title of being the popular and respected Queen of a great and free people. In like manner the children of Her Majesty, who were endowed by the State, were not endowed as relations of Her Majesty; but as part of our general monarchical scheme. They had not a free life, and they were, to a certain extent, the servants of the State. The Princess Louise, through her good fortune and the good sense and wisdom of her Royal Mother, declared her intention of breaking through the charmed circle and living her own individual life. She had insisted on her right to act as the humblest woman in her service was entitled to do—namely, to choose her own husband. In so acting the Princess and her Royal Mother had earned additional respect and affection from the people. But such ties were too sacred to be mixed up with considerations of a more sordid character. The Princess had taken off her fetters, and there was nothing now for the nation to gild. Nothing was further from his wish than to hurt the feelings of any of the distinguished persons most immediately interested. In his opinion the time would come, and that not very distantly, when no one would more regret than these distinguished persons themselves that the Ministry of the day had forced this Vote upon a people who, as far as large masses of the poorer ratepayers were concerned, would give the money very reluctantly.

MR. DISRAELI: I regret that the hon. Gentleman made the speech that he has made, because I think he was arguing the whole time against his own feelings, and his reasonings led him to a conclusion exactly the opposite to that with which he terminated. I am not going to compare the relative position of our own Sovereign with that of the Sovereign of any other

State ; but I cannot help noticing one remark the hon. Gentleman made—he said it was not with Kings or Emperors he wished to compare the position of Her Majesty, but that he would rather cross the Atlantic and make a comparison of Her Majesty's position with that of the Sovereign of the United States. I do not think that we ought really on this question to go into a policy of pounds, shillings, and pence ; but if these matters are brought under our consideration, it is hardly possible to leave them quite unnoticed. If we cross the Atlantic we should find that the Sovereign of the United States—the Sovereign people, is paid through its representatives in both Houses of Parliament an annual salary far exceeding that of the solitary Sovereign of this country. I think the hon. Gentleman will find, if he goes into the question more deeply than probably this discussion is an opportunity for, that the expense of government in the United States—taking the word government in its large and real sense—is one of a very different character from that which he conveyed to the House just now. This is really a simple case if we confine ourselves to that which is fairly before us. I thought the right hon. Gentlemen at the head of the Government, the other evening, placed this subject before us in a complete and unanswerable manner. I was a Member of the House when the Civil List was passed. I have more than once expressed my disapproval of the principle on which the Civil List was founded. It was founded upon an old traditional feeling in this country that we ought to guard against the Crown being in possession of property to an amount that might prove dangerous to the liberties of Englishmen. Now, when we all know that the income of the Sovereign may probably be equalled by more than one of her subjects—when one individual died a few weeks ago, not amongst the most elevated class of society, whose fortune, probably, was quite equal to that which the Crown possesses in this country, it is too absurd for us, I think, any longer to legislate upon these old political superstitions. In my opinion, it would have been much better originally if the Government of Lord Melbourne, when this settlement was fixed upon, had proposed that the Crown estates should be entrusted to the Sovereign. They were sufficient for the personal comfort and dignity of the Crown, and they might have been enjoyed by the Crown with those powers and conditions which apply to all other estates in the country, and which would have allowed the younger children to be amply supported. And as for that public pageantry of the Crown, in which the nation is more interested than the individual who wears the Crown—certainly as much interested, and which I myself highly and deeply value, and which I wish to see maintained in a manner becoming the nation of a famous people like the people of England—that might have been the subject of a Vote in this House—not of an annual Vote, which might have been inconvenient ; but every ten years we might have fixed the supplemental public expenditure of the Crown for those purposes. Ten years would have allowed us to consider any great changes which might have been produced by economical circumstances, such, for example, as the discoveries of gold and their effect upon prices, or other circumstances of that kind ; and then appeals like the present need never have been made, and these misrepresentations of the position of the Crown would never have circulated in the country. However, we have to deal with the circumstances before the House ; and, certainly, the right hon. Gentleman the other night was perfectly justified in saying that the title of the Sovereign of this country to the Crown estate is just as good as that of the Duke of Buccleuch or the Duke of Bedford to their estates. It is an absolute estate, enjoyed by a family, and there can be no question legally that the position of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly sound. But having arrived at the position in which we are placed, what the House has to do is to act according to the spirit of the agreement that was entered into with Her Majesty in 1837, and to support the Crown in its becoming comfort and dignity, and provide, as it was thoroughly understood at the time we ought to provide, in every becoming manner for those members of the family of the Royal House with respect to whom Her Majesty appeals to us. The right hon. Gentleman the other night and the hon. Gentleman to-night have referred to a remarkable feature of the case which is now before us, and I was quite surprised that the hon. Gentleman just now, evidently against his own feelings should have founded his principal argument against the proposition of Her Majesty's Government upon this very circumstance which I consider both novel and interesting. It must have been clear for a considerable time to anyone who gives any attention to these matters that a great change was inevitable in the domestic relations between the Crown and its subjects. For a considerable period the area out of which consorts for members of the Royal Family could be selected has been artificially diminished. By the Protestant Constitution of the country no Prince of the Latin race could intermarry with one of our Royal House. It was quite clear when the revolution commenced in Germany, and the mediatizing of so many reigning Houses of that country occurred—when many of the reigning Houses of Germany who professed the Protestant faith disappeared—that a considerable change was at hand. To me, under these circumstances, the fact of a Princess of our Royal House marrying one of Her Majesty's subjects is really as wise as it is romantic. That the hon. Gentleman, who professes to be a great propagator of democratic principles, should make such a circumstance the groundwork of an argument against the proposition of Her Majesty's Government, appears to me surprising. I confess I have another reason in support of this proposition, totally irrespective of that feeling of loyalty which I am sure is shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and even by the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us. I confess I feel some satisfaction—even I will say exultation—that for the first time a Princess of the Royal House of England is to be married to a Member of the House of Commons. I have such affection for this House that I confess I am not insensible to this honour. Our brother Member certainly has not been very long among us; but I believe I may say, without using any words but those of truth, he has gained our sympathies by his intelligence and by his breeding. The House of Commons will, I think, seize a very unfavourable opportunity if this were the first occasion on which it could successfully oppose such a Grant as that which the right hon. Gentleman has offered to our consideration.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I dare say the House is anxious for a Division; but I am not one of those who think this question should be treated lightly, because we cannot conceal from ourselves that, rightly or wrongly, this proposed alliance has created a good deal of feeling in the country. Now, I do not agree altogether with what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. P. A. Taylor), but neither can I agree with what has just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), because it is at direct issue with the statement made the other night by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman says he was in the House of Commons in 1837, when the Civil List was passed, and if he had had his will he would have had the dowries of the Princesses arranged beforehand. But the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said, the other night, that if the sums of money to be allotted to the children of the Sovereign were granted beforehand, it would be impossible for the Sovereign to accept those terms, and he made use of the expression that it would lay the Royal Family open to idle vituperation. I wish to state that in what I am about to say I yield to nobody in this House in the expression of my sentiments of sincere respect and loyal attachment to the person of the Sovereign. I think that the example which the Sovereign has set in all the domestic and private relations of her life has had a reflex upon all classes of the community, and has endeared Her Majesty in the heartfelt and affectionate attachment of all her subjects. But I must say that the principal object that I have in rising is for the purpose of referring to the statement made the other night by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the other night was, to my mind, one of the most injudicious that I ever recollect to have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. I do not say he intended to mislead the House. I should not be justified in saying so. But I can say this—I will show to the Committee that there were statements made in that speech which are not justified by the facts of the case. I am sorry to trouble the House; but I think this is an occasion of some importance. The other night the right hon. Gentleman said the Queen had a large income, but it was predestined for special purposes. He said savings were out of the question. What struck me the most in the right hon. Gentleman's speech was that the marriage of the Princess with a Member of this House was about to take place—with the son of a Member of the Government, and by the advice of Her Majesty's Government. The statement made by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), that if the House of Commons should not grant the dowry it would be like fining one of the children of the Sovereign for marrying a Scotchman, was a most strained interpretation of the matter. The Prime Minister said that no doubt the income of the Sovereign was a very large one, but that it was given to support the dignity and representation of the Crown: I have no objection to that. The Grant that we give to the Sovereign is for the representation of the Crown; and I am one of those who share the opinion very common in this country, that it is to be regretted that the large sum thus given is not devoted to the representation of the Crown, and for many years has not been devoted to that purpose. I do not speak now of the money not being spent for the benefit of the people of this country; but I do say that when Sovereigns, Princes, and foreigners of distinction visit this country, it is painful to Englishmen to find that the enormous income which we grant to the Sovereign for the representation of the State is not devoted in the way contemplated by Parliament. Now, recollect, I by no means wish to stint the Sovereign. I would wish to see an allowance made on the most liberal scale towards the Royal Family. I am one of those who would vote, if necessary, for doubling the income of the Prince of Wales. I think the income of the Prince of Wales, considering all he has to do for the representation of the country, is too small. He lives amongst us and does what he can; but, of course, on a far less sum than £385,000. I state that to show that I am by no means desirous of stinting the means for the representation of the Crown. The Prime Minister said the other night that by the Civil List of 1837 Her Majesty was granted £385,000 a year, and that it was an economical arrangement; and then he added—I will not say wishing to deceive this House, but certainly not in a manner that one would have expected from him—

Sir Robert Peel

IV.” Well, I have looked, and seen that the Civil List of William IV. was proposed by Lord Althorp in 1831, and it was this—The whole amount, deducting what was given to the Queen of William IV. was £324,700 as against £385,000 given to Her present Majesty. It is perfectly true that if you add £50,000 a year granted to the Queen of William IV. you do bring up the amount very nearly to the sum stated by the right hon. Gentleman; but he included this grant of £50,000 a year when he said that the Civil List voted to William IV. was £435,000. In reality, so far from there being any economy in what was done in 1837, there was a great increase on what had been granted to William IV., exclusive of the £50,000 a year given to his Queen. More than that, when Lord Althorp stated in the House of Commons in 1831 that, having revised the Civil List of George IV., the Government proposed that the sum of £435,000 a year, including £50,000 for the Queen of William IV. should be granted to the Sovereign, he added that he understood the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster would be given up to the State for their entire management the same as the revenues of the other Crown Lands. Lord Althorp, therefore, and the country fully expected in 1831 that the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster would be made over to the State. But that has never been done; and, therefore, in addition to the £385,000 a year granted to the present Sovereign, she has the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster also, and I do not suppose there is in this country such gross mismanagement as is to be found in the case of the revenues of that Duchy. If Lord Althorp's plan had been adopted we should not have had that complaint to make. Will the House believe that, while the revenues of the Duchy amount to £50,000 a year, only about £25,000 is paid to Her Majesty, while the other £25,000 is expended in the grossest mismanagement—I would even say corruption. These are facts. Would it not be better, then, that the policy of Lord Althorp had been adopted, instead of giving to the Sovereign a Civil List of £385,000, with all the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster? I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House now; but I am bound to say that, looking at the statement of Lord Althorp and at the revenues which we give to the Crown—I may stand alone here, but I know there are many in the county in which I reside who think as I do. This very day a gentleman of position from that county told me that there were tens of thousands among the poorer classes in Staffordshire and Lancashire who will disapprove what is now being done. As long as a child or daughter of the Sovereign marries into a Royal or Princely House, I think it is quite right and natural for the House of Commons to give an adequate allowance for the representation and dignity of Royalty. But I hold a very strong opinion that when a child of the Sovereign chooses to lay aside and renounce altogether the Royal position, and elects to marry a subject, the case is wholly different. ["No, no!"] No doubt there is a great difference of opinion on the matter; but, in my judgment, that circumstance entirely changes the point at issue. In that case the Sovereign should be left to make an adequate allowance. But be that as it may, I will conclude by saying I think the marriage an impolitic one. ["No, no!"] As a loyal subject of the Queen, I think the marriage an impolitic one. I do not look at it in the light of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor); but that the Royal position should be maintained distinct and separate as hitherto. Personally, I wish the Royal Princess all happiness in her marriage. I am sure the country will agree with me in that; but I do think the marriage is an impolitic one, and I, for one, would have infinitely preferred to have seen the daughter of our Most Gracious Sovereign marry into either a Royal or a Princely House, rather than accept the hand of a subject, the son of a Member of Her Majesty's Government, upon the advice of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GOLDNEY, amid cries of "Divide!" said, the objection entertained in the country to the dowry arose from its not being known how the £385,000 was made up, and that Her Majesty had nothing like that sum at her actual disposal. To refuse to vote the proposed sum would be a breach of faith. When Her Majesty ascended the Throne it was distinctly understood that by her accepting the Civil List all these contingencies should be met by Votes of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will endeavour to keep strict faith with the Committee, and not in any way to re-argue the question. A number of references have been made by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), to my speech the other evening, and I feel it is absolutely due to the Committee that I should state that I am not able to recognize the arguments they attribute to me as the arguments I used the other evening. I will not, however, go through them in detail; but I will point out one as an example. The right hon. Baronet considers that I stated that the Princess Louise was about to marry the Marquess of Lorne by the advice of Her Majesty's Government. What I stated was, that, upon the important question of the deviation from what had recently been the established rule, Her Majesty had taken the advice of her confidential Advisers, and I may as well state that she did so about 18 months ago, and long anterior to the period when the present arrangement was contemplated. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely in error in supposing that I contended that there was a real reduction in the Civil List at the commencement of the present reign as compared with the commencement of the reign of William IV. I pointed to the reduction of the amount in order to found upon it a corroboration of my argument that morally Parliament was always charged with the obligation of providing for any new exigency growing out of the state of the Royal family. I will only say with regard to the present Motion that I cannot but regret the opposition that has been made to it; and, secondly, that it should have been made at what appears to me to be the wrong time. It is at the first stage of a Vote of this kind that, with the greatest propriety—I should say the smallest departure from it—that opposition should be offered; but I think it is for my hon. Friend and those who intend to vote with him to consider in what position this House will find itself on the question of a personal grant of money if, after hearing the proposal on a former night, they came to an unanimous vote in its favour, they should now disregard the force of the pledge in that unanimous vote, and hark back on the first proceeding.

UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL.—[Bill A.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said: I wish briefly to state the course I intend to pursue with respect to this Bill, and I do so under very peculiar circumstances. My two right hon. Friends the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. S. Walpole) and the Member for Oxford University (Mr. Mowbray) are absent from the House on account of severe domestic afflictions. This might, perhaps, be considered a sufficient reason for postponing the consideration of the measure; but I do not ask for an adjournment. I am, of course, aware that a Bill identical with the present passed through this House last Session; and after the discussions which then ensued, and in which I expressed my opinions on the subject, I should not think of again urging the arguments I then adduced. At the same time, so insuperable are my objections to the Bill as it stands, without the religious safeguards which I hope will be introduced in "another place," that I shall now move its rejection, if only for the purpose of recording my protest against it. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was the repeal of one section of an Act passed last year to regulate the whole subject of constituting and summoning juries. He must explain that towards the close of last Session he was not aware the Bill was about to be pressed to the third reading, as he believed it was understood that it should be allowed to stand over for reconsideration this year. Indeed, he did not know the Bill had passed till he read it in the statute book. The clause which he now proposed to repeal enacted that juries should be paid, and paid not by the whole body of suitors, but by means of a tax imposed solely on those who entered causes for trial. No machinery was provided by the Act for carrying it into execution, that being left to the Judges, who had accordingly issued the best rules and regulations they could devise. These, however, had been extremely onerous to the suitors. The rules required that every suitor who desired to have his cause tried by a common jury should pay £3 on entering his cause; and that for a special jury £12 12s. should be paid. Now, it frequently happened that a cause was amicably settled after it had been entered, so that no jury was required at all, but nevertheless the money could not be returned to the suitor. He was told that in the country the Act could not be worked at all. A Judge of considerable eminence had written to him in the following terms:—"I know that the existing Act amounts to a denial of justice to poor suitors. I know that on circuit it is impossible to carry it out. It ought to be repealed in the shortest possible time." Other Judges and eminent practitioners had expressed a similar opinion. For his own part, he was by no means satisfied it was a good thing to pay jurors, as the effect might be to create a professional class of jurors. He would not argue that point now; but, assuming that jurors ought to be paid, he was disposed to think they should be paid, and not by the litigants. At present, however, it was sufficient for him to state that there would be a dead-lock at the approaching assizes if the clause he had referred to was not repealed, and, as they had already commenced on the Northern Circuit, there was no time to be lost. By the present Bill, therefore, he proposed to repeal that clause at once; and later in the Session, if the House confirmed the principle involved in the clause, another measure might be devised for carrying it into effect. Considering the urgency of the case, he hoped the House would assent at once to the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. LOPES thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman for the prompt attention he had given to the matter, and said that the effect of the Act, combined with the rules of the Judges, was that officers of the Superior Courts found themselves bankrupt. Assuming that at an assizes there were two common jury causes, which were tried on the first day, and one special jury cause, which was tried on the second day, the receipts would be £18 12s., and the payments authorized by the Act would amount to £49 16s.; and this proportion of receipts to payments would probably hold good with any number of causes. A learned Judge, who had just gone to the Welsh Circuit, had said he should be obliged to tell the jurors that, although the Act said they were to be paid, there were no funds out of which they could be paid. He hoped that the matter would not rest where it was, but that the Attorney-General would bring in a comprehensive measure, and that he would not be satisfied with piecemeal legislation, but would introduce a Bill founded on rational and acknowledged principles applicable to the case.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was desirable that the Bill should be passed at once, and he trusted that it would be carried through all the stages as fast as possible. He thought the Law Officers of the Crown were hardly justified in pleading that the Act of last Session was passed without their knowledge. The Select Committee recommended that the whole matter should be remitted to this Session, and the history of the Act of last Session, he believed, was that it was promoted by members of the legal profession in the City of London and Westminster, and that, practically, hon. Members, having the bit put in their mouths, ran away with it.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he thought it was competent for the last speaker, as a member of the Select Committee, to have objected to the passing of the measure of last Session. He was not sure that the public were ungrateful for it, because it had largely diminished the number of causes that went to trial. The principle of the payment of jurors, which he approved, was already affirmed by existing practice, as well as by the recommendation of the Select Committee.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, that provision ought to be made for the proper remuneration of summoning officers.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he was under the impression that the Act of last Session was considered a good one, for all agreed that it was necessary to pay jurymen. He thought the measure a beneficial one, because it would tend to discourage litigation. He would not, however, oppose this Bill if the Attorney General would promise to consider, during the present Session, the matter with a view to the payment of jurors.

MR. WHEELHOUSE supported the Bill, but thought something should be done not only for the payment of jurors, but for the consideration of the whole question in a comprehensive form.

MR. HENLEY believed the whole community would be glad that the hon. and learned Attorney General had moved in this matter. As the assizes were close at hand, it was very desirable that the Bill should pass as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

BANKRUPTCY LAW (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend in the present Session to amend the laws in Ireland relating to Bankruptcy and to Imprisonment for Debt, and to bring them into conformity with the laws of England? The noble Marquess said, it was highly desirable that the application of the law of bankruptcy to non-traders, which had been in operation some years in England, and was an unquestionable improvement, should be at once extended to Ireland, and there was no reason for postponing this till the entire English law on the subject had had a longer trial.

LORD DUFFERIN replied that the Government were fully alive to the necessity of legislation in the direction indicated by the noble Marquess. They intended in the course of the Session to introduce a Bill amending the Irish bankruptcy law, and assimilating the law relating to imprisonment for debt to that of England.

PAUPER INMATES DISCHARGE AND REGULATION BILL [H.L.]

INDIAN FINANCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, it may tend to expedite the despatch of business to-night if, with the indulgence of the House, I now state the intention of the Government with regard to a matter in which some hon. Gentlemen take much interest, and about which a great many Questions have been addressed to me within the last week. I have, then, to announce that Her Majesty's Government intends, on the earliest possible day after determining the most convenient mode of proceeding, to move for the appointment of a Committee upon Indian Finance, in the full belief that the appointment of such a Committee will not only give satisfaction to some hon. Members on both sides of the House, who are very desirous for an inquiry into our financial affairs, but also tend to dissipate sundry apprehensions and misapprehensions which have arisen with regard to them.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to know whether the inquiry of the Committee would be extended to the administration of Indian affairs generally?

MR. GRANT DUFF said, everything properly coming under Finance.

IRELAND—GRAND JURY LAWS.

QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to introduce during the present Session a Bill for the amendment of the Grand Jury Laws of Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that a Bill, founded on the Report of a Select Committee which sat upon this subject a year or two ago, was in a forward state, and would be ready to lay before the House shortly; but as it was the intention of the Government to deal with matters of a similar kind relating to England, during the present Session—matters relating to local government and taxation, it would be probably most convenient if he waited until that measure was introduced, that Irish Members might consider the desirability of incorporating any of its provisions in the Irish Bill.

TRANSFER OF LAND.—QUESTION.

MR. PIM said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government during this Session of Parliament to introduce any Bill to facilitate the Transfer of Land; and, whether such Bill when introduced will extend to Ireland and Scotland, or whether there will be separate legislation for each of the three Countries?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, the Government was ready to introduce the measure as soon as there was a fair prospect of proceeding with it. It would be premature, however, before the introduction of the Bill to inquire whether its provisions should be extended beyond England.

UNITED STATES—THE JOINT COMMISSION—CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Joint Commission which is to sit at Washington will have under consideration the claims of British subjects who had property destroyed at Richmond in consequence of General Breckenridge, previous to evacuating the town, having fired the warehouses and destroyed large quantities of tobacco and other merchandise?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD replied, that the Commissioners had been appointed to discuss in a friendly spirit the various points of difference which had arisen between the United States and subjects of this country. They were not empowered to settle the differences themselves, but would say in what way a settlement could be arrived at, either by arbitration or otherwise; and should a mixed Commission be appointed, in all probability the claims of British subjects against the United States would be referred to such Commission.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—ENTRY OF THE PRUSSIAN ARMY INTO PARIS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any efforts have been made by Her Majesty's Government to dissuade the Prussian authorities from the triumphal march of the Prussian Army through Paris, as it can only have for its object the humiliation of the French nation, and it may be attended by most calamitous results?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he trusted the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight would not think him discourteous if he stated simply that, as no communication on the subject to which his Question referred had been addressed to Her Majesty's Government, Her Majesty's Government had not thought it proper to take any steps in the matter.

RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES DILKE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it be true that Her Majesty's Government have received communications from our Foreign Legations relating to a reported Treaty or understanding between Russia and Prussia; and, if so, whether it is their intention to make such communications, or any of them, known to the House?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, in reply, that although it was true that at different times rumours had reached Her Majesty's Government with reference to the subject mentioned by the hon. Member, as they had never assumed any official shape, they had not been looked upon by the Foreign Department as official communications.

TRADES UNIONS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the Trades Union Bill has been placed in the hands of the editor of a public journal, as appears from an analysis of it published on Thursday, before it has been placed in the hands of Members of this House?

MR. BRUCE replied, that the hon. and learned Member had assumed as a fact that which was not a fact. No copy of the Bill had been placed in the hands of the editor of a newspaper or any other person; but, inasmuch as he was aware that some slight delay would occur in the issue of the Bill, he had directed that an analysis of it should be sent, not to any one paper, but to all. The Bill, in its complete form, would be circulated to-morrow morning.

FRANCE—ALLEGED PILLAGE BY PRUSSIANS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement that the Prussians have, on non-payment of fines imposed by them on various districts since the armistice was concluded, pillaged those districts, is correct; and whether there is any precedent for such a proceeding?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, in reply, that no communication or representation had been made to the Foreign Office with reference to any fines imposed by the Prussians on the French, and he was, therefore, unable to say whether or not the statement to which the hon. Member referred was correct or not. He further asked if there was any precedent for such a proceeding; but he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not think him guilty of an act of discourtesy in saying that not having received any particular information of the statement to which the Question referred he had not thought it right to hunt up any historical precedent on the point.

NAVY—MIDSHIPMEN'S PAY.

QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If any order has been or is about to be issued by the Admiralty, which will compel the parents or friends of midshipmen to make them an allowance of £50 per annum instead of £40 as heretofore; and, if so, on what ground this increase has been made, and what will occur in the case of those midshipmen whose friends and parents are unable to pay the additional sum now demanded?

MR. BAXTER said, in reply, that the regulations increasing the annual allowance to be granted by parents to midshipmen were framed by the First Lord and First Naval Lord after most mature deliberation and in consultation with many naval officers. It was found that £40 a year was inadequate for a midshipman to pay his mess bill and other expenses, and the consequence was that a practice of drawing bills sprang up. To check this an increased allowance of £10 was fixed upon, and, in the opinion of the commanding officers generally, it has been attended with beneficial results. The case supposed by the noble Lord in the latter part of his Question had been met by a clause in a circular issued on the 4th of October, 1870, which says that—

"Should any midshipman or cadet desire to draw less than £50 per annum he is at liberty to do so, provided he obtained the approval of his commanding officer, and can show that all his debts are paid."

INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he wished to ask, Whether, looking to the importance of the measure introduced by the Under Secretary for the Home Department with regard to the Inclosure of Commons, and the fact that it was in the hands of Members only that morning, he will consent to postpone the Motion for a Second Reading until Monday?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, in reply, that, as the Bill in question was not new, but very similar to one that was before the House the whole of last Session, and, therefore, hon. Members might be presumed to be acquainted with its details, he hoped the second reading might be taken on Monday.

FINANCES, &c., OF INDIA.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. FAWCETT said, the course that had been adopted by the Government placed him in a position somewhat difficult and embarrassing. On the very first day of the present Session, according to a promise which he made at the end of the last, with, he ventured to say, the approval of all hon. Members on either side of the House who took an interest in India, he gave Notice that he would move that evening for a Select Committee to inquire into the Financial and General Administration of the affairs of India. He had made a communication as to what they intended to do, but until that hour he could not obtain the slightest intimation of their intention. But that evening, without any warning, the Under Secretary for India rose in his place, anticipated his Motion, and gave Notice of his intention to move for a Committee to inquire into Indian Finance. He might be told that, under those circumstances, he had got what he wanted, and ought to be satisfied without going on any further. Well, he could assure the House that if he got what he wanted it would be a matter of perfect indifference to him whether the Committee was moved for by his hon. Friend (Mr. Grant Duff) or by himself. All he cared about was not who carried the Motion, but whether it was carried at all. But there was this difference between the Notice of the Under Secretary of State and his own—that whereas his hon. Friend said curtly and briefly that he would move for a Committee of Inquiry into Indian Finance—which might mean simply an inquiry into Indian financial accounts—the Committee, on the other hand, which all hon. Members taking an interest in India desired to see appointed, should inquire not merely into the accounts, but into the general administration of that country. The opinion to that effect was expressed at the close of last Session by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, who possessed great practical knowledge and official experience of India. The Committee, therefore, which he proposed would not be merely a Finance Committee, but would inquire, among other topics, into the present position and future prospects of the revenue and expenditure of India; into the management of the public works department, and the outlay it incurred; into the question of primary and higher education in India; into army organization and expenditure; into the local Governments of India and their Councils; also into the transport service; and, above all, into the home expenditure of India—that was to say, the expenditure of Indian money in this country, which was increasing, and now absorbed more than one-fourth of the whole Indian revenues. That House was trustee for that expenditure to the people of India, and was bound to render a faithful account of its trusteeship. The Prime Minister himself frankly admitted the necessity of such a Committee, when at the end of last Session he laid down the doctrine that it was most important that the various Departments of the State should be periodically revised by Committees of that House; and more particularly in the case of India, because of the little attention the House was able to give to the affairs of that country. The right hon. Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) also virtually promised to agree to such a Committee when Secretary of State. Another cogent reason for granting it was this—In the days of the old East India Company, in consequence of the renewal of its charter, the administration of the Company was subjected to periodical revision and investigation; but there had been no Committee on Indian affairs since the House took upon itself the responsibility of the Government of India; and he had reason to know that if the House was unwilling to grant an inquiry into the way in which it had performed that duty it would cause grave discontent among the people of that country. He feared there existed a misapprehension among some members of the Government as to his motive in bringing forward that Motion. They might suppose that he did so as a censure on the present administration of the affairs of India. Nothing, however, could be further from his wish or intention. He believed that Lord Mayo was one of the most popular, most zealous, and hard-working Governors General that India had ever had, and he had no reason to suppose the present Secretary of State for India and his hon. Friend the Under Secretary were in any respect less able Ministers than any of their predecessors. His object in moving for that inquiry was not in the slightest degree to investigate the conduct of Ministers; it was not to be a personal inquiry; its sole and entire object would be to investigate the system they had to administer. He knew that if the Committee was granted many most able witnesses were anxious to give evidence before it, and that all the competent authorities on Indian matters in that House would be ready to serve upon it. The sketch he had given of the scope of its inquiries would convince the House that the investigation must be long and laborious; the sooner, therefore, the Committee got to work the better, and if its appointment were postponed valuable time would be lost. That was his sole reason for bringing on his Motion at the earliest possible period of the Session. He had no wish to anticipate the debate on the Indian Budget fixed for that day week, and he had determined not to mention a single point that could raise a word of controversy. If his hon. Friend the Under Secretary (Mr. Grant Duff) thought it in the least degree an affront to him that that Committee was moved for before he brought forward his Budget, he deeply regretted it; but, whatever his Budget might be, it could not affect the necessity of that inquiry. The Committee would not inquire into the Budget, but into the system of administration, involving great questions of national policy. He was not anxious to oppose the Government more than he found it necessary; if, therefore, they thought they could gain anything for the people of India, or for their own credit or reputation, by postponing that Committee for a fortnight, he was willing, should the House wish him to do so, to withdraw his Motion—but only on the understanding that the Committee proposed by the Government should be moved for on the earliest possible day after the Indian Budget, and that its inquiry should be at least as wide in its scope as the one he had himself indicated to the House. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Under Secretary would withdraw the Notice he had given, and that after that statement—which he trusted was as conciliatory as it possibly could be—his hon. Friend would see that there was no occasion to have another debate on the subject; that, as the feeling of the House was in favour of the Committee, it might just as well be granted at once, and that it should immediately commence an inquiry which, if instituted, would, they might feel sure, give the utmost satisfaction to the people of India. The hon. Member then moved for the appointment of a Select Committee.

MR. R. N. FOWLER seconded the Motion, and presumed that, after the announcement made that evening by the Under Secretary for India, the hon. Member for Brighton would not press his Motion to a Division. He was interested in three questions—the opium revenue, in regard to which he last Session seconded the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), the salt duties, and the Hill Tribes. He apprehended that the questions of the opium revenue and the salt duty would come under the head of Indian finance; but he doubted whether the important question of the Hill Tribes of India—on which he knew that some competent gentlemen were anxious to give evidence—would come within the scope of the inquiry if the Committee was appointed in the terms suggested by the Under Secretary of State, because its terms would limit the inquiry to strictly financial subjects; and he thought there was great force in the appeal made to the Government to appoint a Committee embracing as much as possible those Members of the House who took an interest in the affairs of India.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Financial and General Administration of the affairs of India,"—(Mr. Fawcett),

—instead thereof.

COLONEL SYKES approved the proposal to postpone the appointment of this Committee until after the Indian Budget had been laid before the House; but, at the same time, he hoped that, when appointed, the Committee would have an unlimited range of inquiry. This had been the case with two previous Committees of the House, and the result had been the collection of a most valuable mass of information.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, the last thing which the Government wished to do was to keep a promise to the ear and break it to the hope. If the Government had intended to give a Committee only on Indian accounts they would have said so; but the subject of finance covered a very wide field, and involved questions which, if inquired into fully, would provide more work than could be got through in one or even two Sessions. To inquire into all the subjects alluded to by the hon. Member for Brighton would necessitate not one, but half-a-dozen Committees. A few years ago the simple question of the colonization and settlement of India went through more than one Session; and if the House were to examine not only into all that could be properly said to come under the head of finance, but also into army organization in India, into the questions that might arise out of the public works in India, into the large question of primary education in India, and into the relations of the local governments to the central government, they would go on to Doomsday, and the very object aimed at by the appointment of the Committee would be frustrated. Still longer and more difficult would the inquiry be if they were to go into the extremely interesting, but not immediately pressing, question of the Hill Tribes in India. He was quite sure that all persons in India and at home who understood what questions would be opened by the appointment of a Committee on Finance would be perfectly satisfied with the Committee

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD expressed concurrence in the concluding remarks of the Under Secretary of State for India. The question of finance would cover all the ground, and would especially include the difficult and delicate subject of local taxation, which the Government of India was pressing strongly forward at this moment. With regard to the feeling of the people of India, he could confidently say that there was a most earnest desire for an inquiry in the widest sense into the whole financial arrangements of the country. This feeling had been heightened by the financial mismanagement of past years, and the hurried and high-handed way in which an income tax of 3 per cent had been forced upon the country.

MR. FAWCETT said, that in order to meet the views of the Government, he would be content to strike out of his Motion the words "and General," and leave the Committee to deal only with the financial administration of India.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was very glad to hear the hon. Member for Brighton say he was content to take a Committee on the financial administration of India. In saying that, however, he did not intend to convey the impression that all the other subjects connected with the Indian Government were not matters very proper to be considered when the proper time should come; but to overload the present Committee would be to defeat the object of its appointment. If the question of Indian finance, with all the collateral issues necessarily arising out of it, was not sufficient fully to occupy the attention of the most energetic Committee that ever sat, he did not know what would be. With respect to appointing the Committee, the difference in point of time between Her Majesty's Government and the hon. Member for Brighton was so small he did not apprehend any quarrel; and he now simply wished to appeal to his hon. Friend not to press his Motion at present. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India had spoken of his intention to move a Committee so soon as the best method of proceeding had been settled; and, in so doing, he did not mean to imply that this would involve a delay of a fortnight. He had very great expectation that his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India would be able to redeem his promise at the commencement of the coming week. Under the circumstances, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member for Brighton would see his way to the withdrawal of his Motion.

MR. FAWCETT said, after the satisfactory assurance he had just received, he should not persevere with his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—TERMS OF PEACE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT rose to call attention to the Papers relating to the French and German War, and to move a Resolution thereon. The hon. Member said, it was with a feeling of great responsibility he had undertaken the task which was before him. He could have wished that the Motion of which he had given Notice had been in the hands of an hon. Member of greater experience than he possessed, and one whose words would carry far greater weight; for he must confess that, deeply as he felt on this matter, there was something in it rather painful to him, because having carefully read the Papers presented to the House regarding it, he had deeply to regret the tone which pervaded the despatches that had emanated from our Foreign Office during the progress of this long and terrible war. He knew no person in this country who could feel more pain in view of what had passed during the war than his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government; nor could any man feel more desirous than himself that the influence of England should be exerted towards mitigating the sufferings which the war had caused; but the matter was of so great importance, in view of the position which England held in relation to the other European countries, that he should not hesitate to speak freely and openly, and to ask the House to take what he had to say at whatever value might attach to it. The regret which he felt in reading the despatches was occasioned by the perception that the influence of England, which had undoubted weight with other European countries—that the influence of neutral opinion, in fact, had counted for absolutely nothing during the present war. In the course of the war they had seen many things both strange and new. They saw the other day what was called the doctrine of "benevolent neutrality"—a doctrine which did not last long, but was destroyed by a very skilful despatch written by the Foreign Minister of this country, who, in his turn, invented another kind of neutrality, which might be described as a sort of moral neutrality—a variety which he, for one, very much regretted. It seemed to have been the opinion of our Foreign Office that England was not only to preserve neutrality in regard to the sale of arms, the export of horses, or matters of that kind, but she was bound neither to hold nor to express any opinion whatsoever. It seemed, further, that our Foreign Office had no desire to possess any individuality on the question. He did not know how the despatches had struck other hon. Members; but he had correctly described the impression gathered from a perusal of their colourless pages. From the beginning of the war to the present time there had been a great want of plain powerful speaking on the part of this country. There had been throughout, on the part of the Foreign Office, a distrust of itself, and a determination not to act in concert with other nations. It would be recollected that, at the outset, England was very much grieved and startled to find that the Government of the French Emperor persisted in their demands after the Prince of Hohenzollern had retired from his candidature for the Spanish throne. It was quite true that at that time Lord Lyons spoke gravely and strongly. It was true, also, that his Lordship's language was approved, and that Lord Granville remonstrated; but he did not think anyone could compare the tone of that remonstrance with the enormous gravity of the circumstances, and without feeling that, considering the tremendous issues then depending, this country failed in its duty both to France and by Germany in not speaking much more plainly and much more strongly. He regretted also to notice that at the same time, and also subsequently, this country refused, when pressed to do so, to act with Italy in taking measures with a view to bring about a reconciliation between the contending nations. Since that time what had been England's course? She had,

by reason of her great influence with the other European nations, gathered the neutral Powers into a sort of league, and bound them together under certain conditions. This was a step for taking which Her Majesty's Government deserved the thanks of the country; but, having formed this league, the next step taken by the Government was to reduce it to a state of complete inactivity:—the weapon had been forged but it was allowed to rust useless in our hands. There was not a single act done, not a single word spoken, not a single influence exerted during the existence of that league throughout the whole of the war to bring about a reconciliation between the two belligerents. Yet he could not help feeling that it was a great opportunity—that, if that opportunity had been availed of, out of that league might have grown a new sense of international obligations, that the league so sustained might have been found a great barrier against the violence of nations. He did not introduce his opinion alone. If hon. Members would turn to the last set of Papers presented to the House they would find that Lord Bloomfield thought so too. He wrote in this manner—

"I hoped all the Powers would act steadily together and hold to their declaration, in which case the neutral party in England would become a powerful one, and have a right to be listened to hereafter."

He did not like to quote Russia; but still she had as much insight as any other nation. Very early in the war Prince Gortchakoff wrote to say that

"He hoped Her Majesty's Government would lose no time in making a proposal on the subject to those Powers, and if they accepted it (of which there could be no doubt), the general concert established among them would greatly increase the moral influence which the neutral Powers would be entitled to exercise in any conference which might take place for the restoration of peace."

He would not repeat the charge that this country had prevented other countries from taking a more active part in bringing about peace. It might be so, but he would not make that charge. A friend of his the other day, in speaking to him on this matter, said it struck him that we played the part of a "detrimental." He (Mr. Herbert) did not know what a "detrimental" was. A "detrimental," in the language of a well-known journal, was a part played by a man who paid great attention to a young lady, but who had no serious intentions, and who thereby discouraged the attentions of others. His hon. Friend's idea was that England had not only failed to play her own part, but that she had prevented others from doing theirs in exerting a useful influence. Without raising that charge, he must express his deep conviction that the other neutrals in Europe would have acted if England would but have taken the lead. No man could have read the Papers that had been laid before the House without being struck with the constant appeals which were made to this country. All that was required was that England should give up the stoical attitude of indifference which she had assumed, and had she done so he believed we should have called a great power into existence for the purpose of reconciliation. He was not talking of war—he was not talking of an armed influence—but he was talking of the influence which such a country as this ought to exert—that of a grave, firm, and unfaltering remonstrance against wrong, against violence, whether on the part of France or on the part of Germany. He would call attention to some of the appeals that were made to this country. They would find that on the 27th of August Italy, for the second time, expressed her desire to act in concert with us. On the 10th of September they would find that M. Tissot was charged to represent to Her Majesty's Government that various Governments sympathized with the desire of France to obtain an honourable peace on the basis of territorial integrity. They would find that Austria hesitated to join the league which was formed simply because she wanted the league to be somewhat stronger in its purpose—she was constantly pleading for stronger action. On the 18th of October, Austria expressed her desire to see Europe recover from the torpor which seemed to beset her, and from the fear of a general convulsion. Austria declared strongly against the single action which we were maintaining; speaking touchingly, she said she could not act singly, but she again and again repeated that she was ready to act with us and for us. In the same way, Italy, on the 21st of October, through the Italian Minister, expressed her belief that the proper time to act had arrived, and proposed—what seemed to be a wise course—that the neutrals should consider and draw up the terms which they thought would be possible of acceptance. On the 25th of October Austria was again anxious to associate herself with England. In fact, she was ready to support us in whatever course we might initiate; her only anxiety was that that course should be something more than what it was. ["Hear!"] He heard a cheer from some of his hon. Friends, but he thought they could hardly have read the despatches. If they had read them, they would have seen how little it was that Austria was asking for. On the 5th of November again we had an expression of opinion by Austria that England, with Italy, should act together with her; again, on the 12th of December, we found that Austria proposed a united representation in favour of an armistice; and again on the 21st of December we found that she asked for a collective move and a firmer attitude. While Austria and Italy were anxious that the neutral Powers should take up a stronger position together, we constantly found that France was anxious for the same thing, and was pleading for the same thing. On the 10th of September M. Tissot was directed by M. Jules Favre to represent to our Government how great was the value of English co-operation. M. Jules Favre pointed out how much value public opinion in France attached to English co-operation, and how much that public opinion was afflicted at finding that, while her old and faithful ally was deeply suffering, England still hesitated to take any steps towards reconciliation between the belligerents. When M. Thiers came to England he used similar language, when he said, on the 17th of September, that if England would but lead, the other neutrals would follow; and that it would be impossible even for Prussia to withstand the moral influence of this country. Now, what was England's answer to all these appeals? Why, a cold answer of refusal of all concentrated action. He thought he could best express what was the attitude of our Foreign Office by reading an extract from a despatch—

"Her Majesty's Government have declined to entertain any proposal with the view of localizing the war, or with regard to the eventuality of a combined mediation." [No. 109.]

It was not simply their refusal to act in concert with other Powers, but a greater charge that he felt himself

bound to bring against the Government—and that was that they had distinctly refused to let this country have any opinion on the matter. Whenever any critical moment had arrived our Foreign Minister found himself seized with an incompetency to form or express any opinion respecting it. On September 12, in the 109th despatch, our Government conveyed an inquiry from the French to the Prussian authorities, taking care to say that they conveyed the message verbatim, and without comment. On the 16th of September Lord Granville refused to give an opinion respecting M. Jules Favre's circular, or any opinion as to the terms of the Armistice. He said he had no desire to give an opinion as to the fairness or the reverse of the proposals, although he had an impression that both parties had been extreme. That was the most the Foreign Office had said in the way of expressing opinion. Considering all the miserable circumstances connected with the war, especially the latter portion of it—that seemed to be very cold charity on the part of our Foreign Office; and it was rendered all the more mortifying, because whilst England refused to have an opinion upon those matters and backed herself out with polite indifference, other nations had had not the same fear. Italy was not afraid to express herself with regard to a cession of territory. She distinctly expressed herself as adverse to a cession of territory. She said she thought the terms of peace might be found in an indemnity and a dismantling of fortresses. On the occasion of the Armistice, too, both Italy and Austria were in favour of allowing Paris to be revictualled. The matter was mortifying, because if the neutrals had expressed themselves strongly about it he believed that peace, which was very nearly achieved once or twice, would have been established. That was not his opinion alone; it was the opinion throughout of the French Representatives. On the 8th of October, in the 195th despatch, Count de Chaudordy expressed the feeling that it was absolutely necessary that a common friend should come forward to find out a basis on which peace could be established. He would venture to support the opinion that it lay upon the neutral nations to make the way smooth and easy for peace by an acknowledgment which was made by France that if a Congress of nations was assembled she might be willing to make much greater sacrifices than she was prepared to make directly to Germany. He would also support it by a very important expression on the part of the French Minister at Florence, who seemed to think that France no longer refused to dismantle the fortresses, but would be willing to accept peace on that condition, and also to pay a heavy indemnity. Now, if that were the temper of the French nation, it seemed to require only strenuous and united action on the part of the neutral Powers to have brought about peace on such a basis. Unfortunately, our Foreign Office had found a formula, and under that formula it persistently shielded itself. The formula was repeated in a great many of those despatches, and ran very nearly in these words—"That it was not desirable to offer mediation unless they had reason to believe it would be acceptable to both parties, and a basis on which both would consent to negotiate." That was the position of our Government—it certainly was not the position of other Governments—and he ventured to think that those Governments were right and that our Government was wrong. It was our duty, not to wait for a basis, but to find one. To wait for a basis was to wait dum defluat amnis—until the whole course of the war had flowed on, and at last one party was so reduced that it would be obliged to accept whatever the other chose to inflict. Was it not so? Had not the course of events shown that it was wrong to wait for a basis? Here we were to-day; battle had succeeded battle and siege had succeeded siege, the war had gone on month after month, but the basis for which we were waiting had never turned up until this last moment, when France lay powerless at the feet of Germany. But he would not be speaking quite truly or justly if he were not to mention one startling exception. If the House turned to the 202nd despatch of the 16th of October they would discover something quite out of keeping with the tenour of all the other despatches in the Blue Book. That was a despatch in which we appealed to Russia, and was of so astonishing a character that he read it again and wondered how it found its place in that book. So mysterious were the ways of diplomacy that he could not attempt to fathom what that despatch meant. It might have been written because the Government at that particular moment had determined to give up the attitude which they had assumed up to that period, and which they persistently maintained after that time. It might have been written because they wanted to probe the dispositions of Russia, and they had certain suspicions as to what those dispositions were. The only thing that seemed to him matter of great regret was this — that the despatch was not addressed to one of the civilized Governments of Europe between whose words and opinions there was some sort of correspondence and relation. All he could say was that the spirit which animated that despatch left no trace of itself in any other. It was as wonderful as the toad which was buried in the rock and no opening could be found by which it had got there. But our Foreign Office refused to have any opinion; it was content to perform certain small useful offices for the belligerents. It was willing to carry letters for them, to obtain a safe-conduct, to pass any communication verbatim from one to the other. But, according to his belief, instead of performing the office of a whispering tube, we ought rather to have sought to exercise some moral influence over the two nations, to have moderated their violence, and to have called, with the united voice of Europe, for reconciliation. For himself, he could only say that if England was not to speak fearlessly on such occasions, however powerful might be the nation which she addressed, he would rather that the diplomatic service of this country was entirely given up, and that it was left to the Press and to public speakers to express what this country felt. And now, what remained to be done? He would venture to ask that even at this last moment we might make an appeal which should be worthy of this country. He did not wish that any threatening language should be used—that we should talk of arms, or pretend to do so; what he wanted was, that we should express openly and clearly how strong was our sense of the great evils which would arise if the terms of peace were extravagant and impolitic in their nature. He could only say for himself that terms which should involve the violent annexation of territory were to him immoderate. He clung to the principle which Europe had already learnt to sanction, that the inhabitants of any district ought not to be transferred against their will. That principle had caused a great deal of suffering and bloodshed, and he was not willing to give it up. It was in politics like the law of gravity in physics. It was the one firm abiding place, the one barrier against the violence of military ambition, and he, for one, could not consent to renounce it. But he did not wish in any way to bind the Government by his interpretation of what was immoderate. They must take on themselves the responsibility of deciding what was moderate and what immoderate. At this moment what the terms of peace might be was not known, but it would be impossible for us to discuss the question after the terms of peace were known. Germany had, in her own interest, refused already to communicate them. She knew her work well enough not to let Europe know what the terms of peace might be in time to call out any expression of feeling against them. Moreover, whenever Germany made known to Europe what the terms of peace were, it would be a matter of pride to her to maintain them. Therefore, if the action of the neutrals were to do anything for France in the way of moderating and softening the conditions, it must be now, before the terms were positively known. He objected to compulsory annexation for a great many reasons; not simply because of the injury it would inflict on France. Whatever he might feel about the German Government—however hateful to him was the policy which actuated it now—he had too great a respect and too great an esteem for the great mass of the German people not to wish to see them saved from the great injury which this annexation would inflict upon themselves. He was certain that annexation was a fatal gift; it was a doron—it was no gain, it was the old story—if the conquered suffered at the hands of the conqueror, they also inflicted moral degradation upon him. The annexation of the provinces no man could doubt would prevent the constitutional development of Germany. All that remained for him to do at this last moment was to plead that some united expression of opinion should go forth from the neutral Powers. He might be told that an Emperor who commanded a million of soldiers would not take much notice of such a remonstrance. He could not, of course, persuade any man on this subject who had no belief in moral influence. All he would venture to remind him of was that the whole social and political fabric of this country rested upon the belief that there was such a thing as moral influence; and no newspaper ought, in his opinion, to be written, no meeting to be held, and no speech to be made unless moral influence existed and possessed a certain power. He pleaded for its exercise because he thought we owed it to France, to Germany, and to ourselves. He pleaded for it not simply because France was our old ally, not simply because her independence was of the greatest importance to Europe, not simply because the condition of Europe would for years and years to come be affected by the terms of peace; but he pleaded for it for a much deeper and higher and stronger reason, and that was the great international obligation by which he believed we were all bound, from which we could not escape and ought not to seek to escape, and the spirit of which taught him that it was a thing wrong and inexpedient that Europe should stand apart, in distrust and disunion, and not say a single word or raise a single finger when she beheld one nation deciding on the destinies of another, and saw the conqueror holding in his hands the lives and future of the conquered.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is of opinion that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to act in concert with other neutral Powers to obtain moderate terms of peace, and to withhold all acquiescence in terms which might impair the independence of France, or threaten the future tranquillity of Europe,"—(Mr. Auberon Herbert,)

—instead thereof.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I thank the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken for bringing this question before the House, because in the present very critical state of Europe we cannot have such questions too forcibly or too earnestly brought under the notice of Parliament and the country. I do not mean to say that I entirely agree with the tenour of the hon. Gentleman's Resolution, whilst I must say he has submitted his views in a very excellent and praiseworthy manner to our consideration. There is, however, much which has fallen from him in which I fully concur. I have read this Blue Book solely with the object of considering the interests of England, and what, as a great European Power, should be our influence. The hon. Gentleman expresses a hope that the Government will act in concert with the neutral Powers. The neutral Powers! Where are the Government, I should like to know, to find friends in Europe to act with them? I have read these Papers, and have asked myself in the most impartial spirit—for I take no party view of this question—I have over and over again asked myself whether out-of-doors the public opinion of the country endorses and accepts the policy of the Government. Now, in endeavouring to answer that question, I am prepared to admit very frankly that their task has been a difficult one; although I must add that, in my opinion, they also surrounded themselves with a great many difficulties, and created for themselves not a few enemies. Within the last few months we have been menaced in the far West, and we are threatened in the East. Prussia despises our Government, and laughs it to scorn. There is France—poor France, as the hon. Gentleman has said—our faithful ally and neighbour, drinking at this moment the bitterest cup of national humiliation and sorrow. I should much like to know if, under these circumstances, our policy of isolation—of selfish isolation—has been productive to us of any advantage. I speak of “selfish isolation,” and if I do not justify the use of that phrase by a reference to the Blue Book, so far as the policy of the Government is concerned, I shall be much surprised. We were told some time ago on authority which I am quite willing to accept—the authority of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who has recently left the Ministry—that he believed, speaking from his official knowledge, if Lord Clarendon had lived and remained in power, many of these complications with which we have since had to deal might have been avoided. Now, that may or may not be the case; but there is, at all events, one question which is constantly suggested by a perusal of these Papers. It relates to

Lord Lyons:—and the policy which led to the ungenerous and unmanly flight of the English Ambassador from Paris ought not, in my opinion, to pass without censure in this House. I find that at first he was told by Lord Granville to remain in Paris. Then the Austrian Minister goes to him and says—“We had better get out of Paris;” and Lord Lyons, I believe, himself recommended to the Government that he should take his departure. Now, I wish to point out the position in which Englishmen in that city were placed by such conduct. There were 1,500 or 2,000 English subjects left in Paris, yet Lord Lyons quitted the city on the 17th of September, having, as I understand, been instructed only to leave with the other foreign Ministers. I find, however, that there were in January 18 foreign Ministers and Representatives remaining in Paris, whilst Lord Lyons had taken his departure from it in September. Now just consider for a moment how much credit the Minister of the United States gained for himself by staying in Paris during these events. Was he not able to succour hundreds of his fellow-subjects? The Swedish, the Swiss, the Belgian Ministers, and other Representatives of foreign States, to the number of 18, also remained in Paris to take care of the interests of their fellow-countrymen; but Lord Lyons seems to have been satisfied with saying to the English residents in the city that they must leave it, or remain at their own risk and peril. It is clear, however, that for 1,500 or 2,000 English subjects to act upon his advice at that moment was a thing altogether out of the question. I contend, therefore, that the departure of Lord Lyons from Paris is a proceeding which exposes the Government to the gravest possible censure, and I cannot help regarding his conduct as most unbecoming when contrasted with that of the other Ministers who remained on the spot. While upon that subject, I should wish to draw attention to the statement which was made the other night to the effect that Lord Lyons left Paris at the urgent request of M. Jules Favre. Such was the statement of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in answer to a Question which was put to him; and he was very cautious in his reply, as I observed, being fully prepared with it beforehand. But, with all respect to the

Under Secretary, the statement is not correct. I can find nowhere in these Papers that Lord Lyons left Paris at "the urgent request of M. Jules Favre," and M. Jules Favre being the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, our Ambassador, I should have thought, ought naturally have stayed where he was, and where the Representatives of so many other States also continued to remain. As to the position of affairs generally, I may be allowed to observe that if we had had a strong Government we should have had a resolute policy. We wanted a resolute policy just at that time. I do not concur in some of the observations of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken as to what might have been done; but we wanted a resolute policy. I have observed that since certain events have occurred there has been much weakness and vacillation on the part of the Government, and that difficulties of such great and unexpected magnitude have arisen as not only to embarrass but almost to overwhelm them. One great difficulty, at all events, they appear to have grappled with with the most complete success. I allude to the success which has attended their efforts in bringing about in the brief period of 12 months so much of humiliation to the character and credit of this country. We talk of our national pride and of the moral influence of England; but the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has advised us, in the opinion of the Prussian Government and Count Bismarck, to accept a policy of obliteration. I believe that this country has lost caste, and that in the course of the last two years this country, in the councils of Europe, has achieved more unpopularity than was accomplished by the policy of any other statesman within the last 30 or 40 years. ["No!"] An hon. Member behind me says "No!" Go to France—go to Switzerland—go to Germany—go to Belgium—countries which I have recently visited. Why, the universal expression of opinion on the part of all classes of society, echoed in the columns of the newspapers, is, La politique du Gouvernement Anglais fait honte! That is what you hear abroad. I have visited those countries, and can speak from my own observation. Now, what is the attitude of the Government? And when I speak of its attitude, I should be glad to say, by way of parenthesis, that I only refer to the attitude of the Government, and that I separate altogether from it the attitude of the country. I have admired—we all must have admired—the splendid philanthropy which has been exhibited. When one has witnessed, as I have witnessed, the thousands and tens of thousands of miserable victims of this war, thrust into Switzerland, maimed, and wounded, and crushed, and has thought of what England did to benefit, to assuage, and to alleviate this misery, I own that I have rejoiced at what has been done—that I have felt proud of my country. I speak, therefore, only of the political attitude of the Government. What that has been France, I suppose, knows pretty well. At all events, the Government, through one of its Members, expressed its opinion pretty freely about France; for I recollect, when I was in that country, seeing what I considered a most ungenerous taunt on the part of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I am very glad that he has since endeavoured to explain it away, stating that he was badly reported, for I can assure the House that the fact of a Secretary of State being even supposed, at such a moment, to utter an ungenerous taunt against France created a most painful impression abroad. But I pass from that to the estimate which other Governments have formed of the attitude of our own Government. Take the opinion of the United States of America, in the most unfriendly message ever presented to Congress by the President, referring to relations with this country—take the opinion of Russia, as shown in their despatches and public utterances—take the opinion also of Prussia, which is very remarkable. I hold in my hand an extract from the German Official Gazette for December, a gazette which is believed to be under the inspiration of Count Bismarck and the highest authorities; and this is the way they talk of the Government of England—

"It is perfectly idle to talk of the attitude of England, inasmuch as its policy admits of but one attitude—viz., that of obliteration."

Now, that is a literal translation of an article that appeared in the German Official Gazette in December last. And then the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government protests that we have not followed a policy of selfish isolation.

I fear very much, nevertheless, that this is the policy that must be attributed to our Government. I have here some extracts from the speeches of Ministers, showing what we have ventured to do, and what we have not ventured; and I really think this country has some reason to blame the Government for not having acted in the earnest manner which might have been expected. I will read one or two of these extracts, and the House will observe that in every one of them the word "ventured" occurs in some shape or other. "We ventured" to do this, or "we ventured" to do that.

"We ventured to disapprove the demand made by France upon the King of Prussia for a prospective engagement respecting the candidature of Prince Hohenzollern for Spain; but then it was our misfortune to fail. . . . We ventured to appeal to the Treaty of 1856 as to a reference to some competent tribunal for a settlement of the disputes between France and Prussia; but we did not obtain a hearing."

This is the language of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. Now observe this—

"We expressed, in language so respectful that no objection could be taken to it, a hope that Prussia would not have recourse to the extreme measure of a bombardment of Paris. But we failed."

Again—"We ventured to favour" the calling together of an Assembly fully authorized to represent France—I assure the House that I am using the literal expressions of the Government. Again—

"We ventured to point out that little good was likely to arise from the multiplication of abstract declarations with reference to the terms of peace."

["Hear!"] I do not dispute the fact—I am only showing now how "venturesome" the Government have been.

"In the next place, we 'ventured' to suggest to the Government of Germany that it would be conducive to the general welfare, if they found themselves in a condition to make known what were the terms of peace which they deemed to be required."

This expression "we ventured" occurs throughout the whole of the correspondence, and as it is the manner of dealing with the question which is characteristic of the Government, I submit respectfully to the House that it is not the language which Lord Palmerston would have used. The language which Lord Palmerston used in the troubles upon the Continent has been detailed by my right hon. Friend and Colleague (Sir Henry Bulwer), whom I am glad to see in his place to-night for the first time. "Ventured to do" this, or "ventured to do" that—why this language is unworthy of a great and powerful nation! In common with many others upon both sides of the House, I am unable to listen to such language patiently. Now, how does the Minister for Foreign Affairs maintain his policy of selfish isolation? The hon. Member below me (Mr. A. Herbert) quoted some passages from the correspondence; but I am afraid he stopped sooner perhaps than he intended, for, not having the exact references at hand, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was enabled to complain that he was not so accurate as I shall be in my quotations. Lord Lyons writes to Lord Granville on the 19th of August, at page 15, that, "under instructions," he had informed the Government at Paris that Her Majesty's Government had no desire to "obtrude their mediation either on France or Prussia," but that

"Their good offices would be freely given, and zealously exerted for the restoration of peace, if at any time recourse should be had to them."

I quite agree with that; it is an excellent sentence, and if it had only been followed up by action in the same spirit, I should have cheered as loudly as the hon. Gentleman who is sitting next my right hon. Colleague; but if he will give his attention to the next extract or two he will find how those zealous intentions cooled. On the 6th of September M. Jules Favre invited the good offices of England with a view to an armistice; but "Lord Granville to Lord Lyons" on September 7 said—

"You will inform M. Jules Favre that Her Majesty's Government consider that they would be more likely to do harm than good to the cause of peace if they attempted to mediate"

—and I think they would with their "venturesome" policy. And then came a letter not to our Ambassador at Paris, or to be communicated to M. Jules Favre, but written directly by Lord Granville to Baron Brunow, saying that Lord Lyons had been informed that Her Majesty's Government would not attempt, either alone or with other Powers, to offer mediation unless they had reason to believe it would be successful. ["Hear!"] Yes; but by that letter they declined to take any initiative whatever, or to accept any invitation whatever, to co-operate unless they were assured of success. That was a very different thing from the assurance which Lord Lyons, acting "under instructions," had given to the French Government. Then came the private diplomatic mission to London with which M. Thiers was charged. At p. 73, Lord Granville wrote to Lord Lyons as to this—

"I have had an interview with M. Thiers, and he implored Her Majesty's Government to allow England to show her sense of her long alliance with France, and thus assert her own place in the councils of Europe."

Lord Granville's reply was—"The Government must judge what is best for themselves;" and objected to even an offer of mediation, or of good offices. Why, Lord Granville had just before said that the Government would most zealously exert themselves, if any application were made to them for their good offices. [An hon. MEMBER: By both the belligerents.] No; the phrase is either on the part of France or Prussia. And yet, when M. Thiers implored us to show our sense of the long alliance, Lord Granville replied that the Government must judge what was best for themselves, and objected even to an offer of mediation or good offices. Can you conceive such a niggardly policy? They decline to mediate—they will not even give their good offices to a country that has been our close ally and friend for the last 20 years—a country that upon 20 battlefields in unison with England has sacrificed her best blood and her bravest sons for objects which the two countries had at heart. Yet this is the answer we give to M. Favre and to M. Thiers. M. Thiers, by the way, was excessively complimentary to Lord Granville. I do not know why, but he spoke in the highest terms of Lord Granville's father. Now, one is always proud to hear one's father spoken well of; but why such pains should be taken to record in a letter from Lord Granville to Lord Lyons, forming part of the official correspondence upon the French and German War, that M. Thiers remarked to Lord Granville—"What an excellent fellow your father was—" [Laughter.] I cannot at this moment lay my hand on the passage, but I commend it to the reading of hon. Gentlemen—why it should ever have been said, or why it should have been put there, I do not know, except that it may have been done with a view to reciprocity. Lord Granville writes again to Lord Lyons respecting M. Thiers's view—this was after he had spoken so highly of his father—and he states that he told M. Thiers he was not jealous of any action which the neutral Powers might take which would lead to peace, but that he did not care to join them. Let the House hear these extracts, and say if this is the manner in which the foreign policy of this country should be conducted—whether it is anything else than a policy of isolation. Take this paragraph; it occurs on page 82, No. 134, in a despatch of Earl Granville to Lord Lyons—a most curious despatch, as you shall hear—

"On parting, M. Thiers made an observation which, coming from an eminent statesman, it is tempting to a son to record. He adverted to the time when he transacted business with my father, when the latter was Ambassador at Paris. He himself had been brought up in the school of M. de Talleyrand, but he had always considered Lord Granville as the beau idéal of a diplomatist—a proud Englishman, able, gentle, straightforward, and honest: proud indeed, as he had found when once he had a movement of vivacity with him."

Sir, I quite agree in that character of the late Lord Granville, and I also think the present Lord Granville the beau idéal of a gentleman in every way. I say not one unkind word of my noble Friend; but I think these extracts—with which I have troubled the House, I fear, at too great length—show that the policy of this Government has been one, as described in the German gazette, of obliteration, and, as I say, of selfish isolation. I was surprised to hear the conduct of Prussia spoken of as it was the other night. I must say I look on the unification of Germany as a great peril to Europe; and for this reason—no one will deny that the unification of Germany began with an essentially democratic movement. Since 1830 15 Sovereign Princes have been removed from their thrones by their respective people. What greater proof can there be of an earnest democratic development? We have at this moment the unification of Germany under a military despotism. Can that be for the good of Europe? It cannot be for the good of Europe that there should be a great military despotism in Germany, built up on the ruin and destruction of France. German unification began in 1848. It was worked out by the absorption of Hanover, Holstein, and Hesse Cassel: and now the Sovereigns of Würtemberg, Baden Baden, and Saxony think to stave off the evil day to themselves by offering the Imperial Crown to the King of Prussia. I do not believe that the unification of Germany as a military despotism can be for the good of Europe. I do not believe it will last. I think the time will speedily come when we shall see it swept away. But I do regret, in this particular also, the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. They made haste to salute the new-born Empire of Germany in the French Palace of Versailles; but could not say one kindly word to France. Such conduct was an insult to France, and all that was noble and generous in its history. I should have liked Her Majesty's Government to have made some recognition of the Republic in France, for I am firmly convinced that is the only system of government that can prevail for good in that country. I am not singular in that opinion. M. Thiers himself, the greatest statesman in France, in 1848 said distinctly that it was the form of government which caused the fewest divisions in the country—C'est le gouvernement qui disire le moins; M. Guizot also calls it "a noble form of government." Considering what had occurred in France, I think Her Majesty's Government might have acted somewhat differently towards that country, which had been so faithful an ally of England. There are three facts to which, if the House will allow me, I should wish to refer, as showing the savage manner in which this war has been carried on by Prussia, and the bitter antagonism that existed at the end of a few weeks. The House will hardly credit what I am going to state; but I have myself taken pains to ascertain the facts. We all know how villages have been sacked, whole provinces wasted, and millions of francs levied in requisitions on towns; but here is an order of the day of Prince Frederick Charles, which, so far as I know, has never been contradicted. I wrote to inquire if it was true, and I received in reply that it was stuck up in Mans and had never been contradicted. The document is in French, but I will translate a few of its expressions—

"Exert all your activity," he says to his soldiers, "march and parcel out this impious land. Exterminate this horde of brigands which they call the French army. The world cannot rest in peace so long as the French people survive."

[“Oh, oh!” “Hear, hear!”] Such language will give the House a valuable insight into the manner in which this war has been waged. But here is a document, if possible, still more remarkable. Here is a Royal order of the King of Prussia himself. I hope he never saw it, so very severe is it. It refers to Alsace and Lorraine—which the House will remember have not yet been attached to Germany by any legal instrument. It bears date the 13th of December, 1870—it was posted up in Strasburg—and there is no doubt of its authenticity. The first article of this Royal order of the King of Prussia is this—

"Whoever joins the army of France is subject to confiscation of his property and banishment for ten years."

Article 2 declares that—

"Publication for three days in the Official Gazette is sufficient to give the condemnation force of law."

Article 5 says—

"Whoever is absent for more than eight days without leave is held to have incurred the penalties of the articles above mentioned, and to suspect is sufficient for condemnation."

Is it possible that in the middle of the 19th century war can be conducted on such terms? 13,000 young Alsations have joined the French army in defence of their liberties and lives. Can it be that this atrocious order will be carried into effect as regards them? I will give one more instance. The House will recollect that after the armistice which was made on the 27th of January, after three days' negotiation—I was then on the frontier of France and Switzerland—the King of Prussia telegraphed to Berlin that an armistice had been concluded, and it applied to all the forces in the field and on the water. But how was it applied? M. Jules Favre telegraphed to Bordeaux to the effect that the armies were to remain in possession of the tracts of country occupied by them, with a zone of neutral territory separating the respective forces of the two countries. Well, after that order had been circulated, and after General Bourbaki had in a fit of despair endeavoured to commit suicide, General Clinchamp, who succeeded him, issued an order of the day informing the 80,000 soldiers under his command that an armistice had been agreed upon, and that the troops were not to resume hostilities until it had expired, and yet after what had occurred, the Prussian General Manteuffel actually attacked these 80,000 Frenchmen and drove them over the mountains of the Jura into Switzerland. I saw this wretched army. I came across thousands of men frost-bitten, without shoes, and wholly unable to protect themselves from the inclemency of the weather. Is it not lamentable that, under the circumstances, such an attack should have been made? But I must conclude, expressing my thanks to the House for having allowed me to make these remarks. I feel very strongly that the Government is not following, and has not followed, such a policy as this country ought to pursue. I do not, indeed, wish to see this country rush rashly into war—God forbid!—but I know that before the commencement of the war Austria and Italy told Her Majesty's Government that they were prepared to join us in a determined and resolute denunciation of the conduct of France in proposing to attack Prussia. I am satisfied that if Her Majesty's Government had acceded to the request of Austria and Italy they would most probably have succeeded by mere moral influence in preventing the war. Even if this had not been the result, I think the Government ought to have followed a policy different from that which they have chosen. I am ashamed to say that everyone who reads the Blue Book must feel the deepest pain when he finds what the policy of our Government has been, and I most sincerely hope that they will at once bestir themselves in a different line of policy. We are most unpopular abroad; we have lost caste abroad. Still the spirit of the country is the same, and is willing to back up the Government in any way they may think desirable. ["No, no!"] I venture to say that if there was need—if an enemy should attack this country—there would be one universal expression of national spirit vibrating through all the arteries of the country. But in return for that demonstration of national spirit, which has never yet failed in times of emergency or under the pressure of circumstances, we have a right to demand, and we do demand, of the Government of the day that by its policy and by its acts it shall maintain this country in that position which she once so proudly held in the estimation of her people and in the councils of Europe.

MR. W. C. CARTWRIGHT craved the indulgence of the House, which he was addressing for the first time. Moreover he was addressing it on a subject which was full of delicate complications, and was following two Members who had ably reviewed the policy of the Government with respect to it. The Resolution before the House, however, did not refer to transactions already passed—it professed to be a guide for the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the terms of the peace now about to be negotiated between France and Germany. He thought such a Resolution both inopportune and impolitic. It was inopportune because it was brought forward at a moment when every effort should be made that could be made to allay the violent passions which had been aroused in France; and it was impolitic because, at a moment when those passions seemed about to be allayed, it would tend to re-awaken those misconceptions of which we had already seen too much. Misconception had been the predominant error and failing of France throughout this war, from its initiation down to its bitter end. One of the most remarkable utterances, well to be borne in mind, which was recorded in the Blue Book, was the statement made to Lord Lyons by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, before distress came very near home to the French people, in reply to an offer of friendly offices. The answer of the French Minister for Foreign Affairs—given almost with superciliousness—was, "We want no mediation from any party;" but when distress pressed more and more heavily on the French people, then French statesmen clamoured fearfully—not for mediation merely, but for active interference. If this Resolution should be carried at this untoward moment the French belief in the inevitable arrival of succour from abroad, which had already been the cause of so much evil, would only be confirmed. The more he studied the Resolution the more he was driven to the conviction that it was incapable of acceptance by the House. The Resolution began by saying that the House was of opinion that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government, in concert with other neutral Powers, not to recommend—for had his hon. Friend contented himself therewith, he, for one, would have had nothing to say against this part of the Resolution—but actually to obtain moderate terms of peace. Such a Resolution, so worded, would impose on Her Majesty's Government a positive obligation very capable of involving it in complications of the gravest nature. For to fasten on Her Majesty's Government the duty to obtain terms was to fasten on it a duty not of effort, but of certain positive results. But could his hon. Friend state how he would secure the attainment of such results? He had listened with attention to his speech, and had quite failed to catch any indication of what means he would have Her Majesty's Government put in play. All he had been able to glean from his hon. Friend's own commentary on his counsels, was his distinct declaration that he had no wish to see Her Majesty's Government use violence or have recourse to arms. Well, then the Resolution went on to assert it to be the duty of the Government to withhold all acquiescence in terms which might impair the independence of France or threaten the future tranquillity of Europe. Now, had the House a clear comprehension of what it was asked to resolve in those terms? In his speech his hon. Friend had given it as his opinion that all terms involving any cession of territory were to be reprobated as immoderate; so that, by the terms of the Resolution, it would be the duty of the Government "to withhold its acquiescence" from the annexation of Alsace, even though such annexation were effected in virtue of an instrument signed and sealed by France and Germany. Now, such an instruction as this was simply to make the Government have recourse to a hollow diplomatic fiction. No doubt, precedents for such a course existed; but what sort of precedents were they that we should be tempted to follow them? One happened after the Italian War, when Austria refused to recognize the fusion of the central Italian provinces into the kingdom of Italy. The consequence was that for Austria there still existed a Duke of Tuscany—a Pope in the Romagna—and that it declined to have its Consuls and other agents take cognizance of the actual Sovereign in possession of those countries. Was that any benefit to Austria? And another precedent was forthcoming from the action of this country in one instance. When Algeria was wrested from the Dey by France, for years this country would not recognize this conquest; and actually down to a comparatively recent date our Consuls in the French possessions in Africa were made to take their exequaturs from the Sultan. But, for all that, the fact remained the same; and he would ask the House if it really thought the dignity of the country had been raised by such a procedure so that it considered a repetition desirable? Well, then, he wished the House to consider how vague were the expressions in the Resolution, and how difficult it was to determine what "terms might impair the independence of France and endanger the tranquillity of Europe." His hon. Friend had already expressed his opinion that all cession of territory was to be reprehended as a grievous wrong to France. But could any really impartial person declare that any surrender of territory by France must amount to dismemberment, and constitute a monstrous outrage on that country? Look at what was done by France about Savoy and Nice. The latter province was taken, though Italian in language as well as Italian in tendency and affection, while Alsace was German in tongue, and had at all times kept up certain national relations with Germany. But how was his hon. Friend going to define what was or was not threatening to the future tranquillity of Europe? The cession of Alsace was insisted on by German statesmen in 1815, precisely on the ground that they considered the non-surrender of it by France a danger to the future tranquillity of Europe. And did not practical facts prove the correctness of their anticipations, and show that danger was to be apprehended rather from the Power which had the province than from the Power which now claimed to acquire it? This was an illustration of the great difficulty of defining with accuracy the practical sense of the expressions which the Resolution contained, and forecasting off-hand the conditions of the world's future. He had lately read a letter which, no doubt, many Members of the House had also read with the same interest, addressed by M. Guizot to the Prime Minister, couched in terms singularly pathetic as coming from one far down the role of years, and who, with almost a foot in the grave, had to look back upon his country in the depth of grievous humiliation, which during so many years he had been helpful in governing with honour and success. He would be the last man to say one word which could reflect on one so venerable and so distinguished; but, as the letter in question was professedly meant as a statement of the case on behalf of France, he could not refrain from drawing attention to one inaccuracy which was not without importance in considering the points at issue. M. Guizot protested against the inordinate demands of the Germans, and contrasted them with the more liberal actions of his countrymen. He instanced the disinterestedness of France, which, he said, in 1859 was content to ask for no more than Savoy and Nice. What, however, really happened was this—France went to Italy as a liberator, and when, owing to circumstances, she did not carry out her original programme to free Italy from the Alps to the Adriatic, she waived her claim for these provinces, but turned round to Italy and said—“You must pay me for my assistance in the field.” She accordingly presented a bill of 70 millions for materiel de guerre lent to Italy in the campaign; and when the bill was paid she extorted Savoy and Nice as compensation for acquiescence in the fusion of the central Italian provinces, and no voice in France—not even that of M. Guizot—was raised against their annexation. All Frenchmen looked upon it as a glorious consummation. The capital danger of France—which the mover of the Resolution, in spite of his sterling sympathies with that country, was doing his best to foment—was that throughout the whole of this unhappy war French statesmen had laboured under the belief that there was something so sacrosanct in the essence of the French constitution as must compel the rest of the world to come to her rescue; and, if one act more untoward than another could be committed, now that the French Assembly was meeting at Bordeaux, it would be that the House of Commons should adopt such a Resolution as this, which the mass of imper-

fectly educated Frenchmen would accept as the demonstration they had been hitherto waiting for in vain—that there was a determination in this country in favour of that active interference by the neutral Powers which French Ministers had been clamouring for as due to the rights of their country. Another dangerous hallucination which had taken possession of the French political mind was, that if they could not get peace according to their original programme—that was to say without the surrender of any French soil—then they hoped, at all events, to bring in the neutral Powers in such a manner as to throw upon them the odium and responsibility of forcing on France terms of surrender distasteful to her. The proof of this notion was to be found throughout the Blue Book, but especially in almost the last cry for help contained in this correspondence. Writing from Bordeaux on the 16th of December to Lord Granville, Lord Lyons, reporting what passed at an interview with Comte de Chaudordy, gave this version of the French Minister's statement—

“There were, he said, three different arrangements possible, any one of which might have the desired effect. The first was an armistice, on the condition of Paris being re-victualled for the time it lasted. This would render the election of a National Assembly possible. The second was a peace without any cession of territory. The third was a European Congress to determine the conditions of peace. To such a Congress France might make concessions to which she never could be brought if she were left to negotiate with Prussia alone.”—[No. 317.]

Now, this last alternative which the French would accept would leave necessarily something behind which would rankle in their minds. Another illustration of the same wish to commit the neutral Powers was to be found in a passage which followed. The Comte de Chaudordy desired Lord Lyons to ascertain the terms of peace which Germany would accept, but, he said—

“The inquiry must be made by Her Majesty's Government as coming from themselves (en dehors de nous), and not as being in any way prompted by France.”

If such an interference as that suggested by the Resolution were attempted, and if such a Congress were assembled, whatever terms they recommended to France, these would assuredly leave rankling in the minds of Frenchmen a deeper feeling of resentment against the neutral

Powers, and especially against us, than any which had hitherto existed, and impress afresh upon the French imagination that kind of animosity which it entertained against the coercion France had been forcibly obliged to acquiesce in at the hands of an overpowering coalition in 1815. The tendency that ran through the whole spirit of these French proposals was to put the neutral Powers in a position in which they might get looked upon as the agents on whom rested the responsibility of having dictated to France acceptance of terms which, from single-handed Germany, she would never have accepted. He believed, therefore, his hon. Friend (Mr. A. Herbert), while his earnest sympathy with France could not be doubted, would be acting not as a friend, but as an enemy to that country, should he succeed in obtaining the adoption of this Resolution. His hon. Friend should consider the responsibility which must attach to anyone who, at this moment, when France was prostrate, did anything to induce her not to meet the Germans fairly, and concede fair terms of peace. The programme of France, the only one she had officially proclaimed—"Not an inch of our territory, not a stone of our fortresses"—did certainly not offer fair terms; and at that critical moment it became the true friends of the French people, instead of fomenting passionate impulses, to induce them to meet the Germans fairly, and yield those terms of peace which their enemy had earned for herself by successes won with so much gallantry and skill.

MR. GOLDSMID said, the views which the Government had expressed in their Blue Book were the views entertained generally throughout the country. The country was satisfied with that policy which the hon. Member for Nottingham called a "colourless" policy, and which the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), had stated was a policy wanting in resolution. Now, what did such a statement involve? It appeared to him (Mr. Goldsmid) in itself to furnish a proof that the language of Her Majesty's Government had been well-weighed and deliberate. A so-called "colourless policy" on the part of the Government must go to show that they had endeavoured to keep a fair balance of justice between the two contending parties. The words of Lord Granville—which the right hon. Baronet, however, had hardly fairly quoted, for he read part only of the despatch—showed this to be the case, for Lord Granville stated expressly that he was unwilling to mention any terms or offer any mediation between the parties, unless he had reason to believe that those offers would be acceptable. What could be more sensible—what could be more reasonable—than such a statement?—because it was perfectly obvious that the only result of any other course would have been to bring even greater discredit on England than, according to the right hon. Baronet, now attached to her. But he (Mr. Goldsmid) thought the statement of the right hon. Baronet that England no longer maintained her former high position among the Powers of Europe was disproved by the fact that all through the proceedings to which this Blue Book referred constant appeals were made to England, and that she had been attacked equally by both parties for the position she had assumed. He would go further than that. He would say that the position of neutrality was the proper position for England to assume. Under that position they were attacked by both sides on various grounds—for example, by Prussia for the export of arms. Well, was it not a fact that the export of arms from America had been far greater than the export of arms from England? Yet, in consequence of a Treaty which Prussia concluded some years back with the United States, it was an admitted fact that Prussia had given authority to the United States to export arms to any country at war with Prussia which might be used against her; and it was, therefore, hardly fair to say that they had no right to do what Prussia had ceded power to another nation to do. Such an attack as that which had been made went to show that their position of neutrality was an inviolable position, and the proper position for England to take up. Because if they had not been neutral, what would have been the result? Had they not heard of a policy of "meddling and muddling," and the discredit of saying too much without being prepared to follow up words with acts? Had they not an instance of this in the case of Denmark, and other instances in European history? He felt, therefore, that the duty of Her Majesty's Government was, instead of expressing an opinion, to refrain from expressing an opinion which they did not think likely to be acted upon. He maintained that the action of the Government was in accordance with the wish of the great majority of the people, who desired that this country should abstain from interference in the war, which on the one side and the other was a war of conquest. The origin of it, as it appeared to him, rested in iniquity. The object of the war on the part of France was, at the beginning, conquest; and, on the part of Germany afterwards, the subjugation of France and the appropriation of entire provinces. If Her Majesty's Government had adopted a policy of threatening—a policy of using words which they did not mean to follow up by acts—they would have met with universal reprobation. More than that, it must be remembered that an expression of opinion which came from a British Minister was regarded as an expression of the opinion of the country; and, if Lord Granville had expressed the opinion which the right hon. Baronet would have wished him to express, he would have involved the country in the most serious difficulties. He (Mr. Goldsmid) wished also to say a few words on the terms of the Notice of the hon. Member. The Motion before the House called upon the Government to act in concert with other neutral Powers to obtain moderate terms of peace. Now, he would like to know what right Her Majesty's Government had to suggest terms of peace, unless one of the belligerents, at least, asked them to do so? It appeared to him that if Government were to act in the way the Motion pointed out they would probably be told in polite words to "mind your own business," and if such were the result of her interference England would lose her credit on the Continent more than by any other proceeding which could possibly have been adopted. But the Motion further asked the Government to withhold all acquiescence in terms which might impair the independence of France. Now, if the Government of this country were to say to the Prussian Government—"We propose to withhold our acquiescence in terms of peace which will impair the independence of France," Count Bismarck's simple answer would be—"What do we care about it: you may withhold your acquiescence or not; but unless you mean to back up your words by deeds I do not care about your acquiescence;" and, consequently, by such a course the Government would involve itself in a line of conduct which the country would not approve. The Motion appeared to be unnecessary, for it was pretty well known throughout Europe that the opinion of England was that the war had gone too far, and that the terms of peace should be moderate. The terms which had been announced indirectly as those which the Germans were about to impose had been received in England with universal reprobation. He believed that the wisest course, and the course which would be approved by the country was that which the Government had adopted—namely, not to interfere unless they saw reason to think that their words would carry weight; and if they were requested by either belligerent, then to express their opinion jointly with other neutrals in favour of the most moderate terms. He (Mr. Goldsmid) concluded, therefore, that the whole of these proceedings, as shown in the Blue Book, proved that the British Government were throughout this matter well able to conduct the foreign affairs of the country in a calm and judicial spirit befitting the position of neutrals, which, though disagreeable to belligerents, was, he believed, in consonance with the feelings of the people of this country.

VISCOUNT ROYSTON said, there was a very strong feeling among the nations of Europe in regard to the position in which France was placed. The sympathy which they might give to France was perfectly natural—indeed if it were not given, it would be even unnatural; but much as he sympathized with France, in common with every Gentleman in the House and with the people of the country, he could not think that the Motion which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Herbert) had put on the Paper was conducive to the better arrangement of terms of peace, or would be satisfactory to the general feeling of this country. Under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman, this country had pursued a policy which, however we might sympathize with our neighbour, he must candidly own had been a sound one. The policy of neutrality was one of considerable difficulty owing not only to the opinions current among the population of this country, but also to the feelings and opinions which might exist abroad. This country, living under a settled government, and exposed to no temptations of foreign acquisition, could afford to stand aside from the quarrels of Europe and maintain a strict neutrality. Let them look back to the various questions which had agitated the Continent of Europe, and in regard to which indignation had been expressed against our "isolated policy." In the year 1863 the Danish question arose, which created great confusion in the councils of Europe. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was at that time a member of Lord Palmerston's Government, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth had twitted him with the remark that if Lord Palmerston had been Prime Minister of this country at the present time he would not have adopted the line of policy of the present Government. With all respect to Lord Palmerston's memory the present foreign policy of neutrality adopted by this country was rather started by him. Lord Palmerston spoke in this House in the strongest terms of reprobation of the annexation of Schleswig and Holstein by Prussia. From that annexation dated the whole misery which had now fallen upon Europe. He himself heard Lord Palmerston—for, though not a Member of the House at the time, he happened to be present during the discussion—make that speech in which he wound up with saying that "Denmark would not stand alone." Lord Russell, who was then Minister for Foreign Affairs, was in active negotiation with the Emperor of the French to get him to act in concert with England—to get him to back up the treaty, by which England and France had guaranteed Schleswig and Holstein to Denmark. Everyone knew that the Government of the day, feeling that the position of Prussia was becoming dangerous to Europe, and foreseeing the consequences which might possibly take place if such a scandalous break-down of treaties was permitted, made a strong resistance to the policy of the Chancellor of the North German Confederation. Unfortunately—because it had been a great misfortune to the Emperor of the French—he did not act in consort with the British Government in regard to Schleswig and Holstein. Lord Russell's policy which had been described by the late Lord Derby in the House of Lords as a policy of "meddle and muddle," did not certainly gain that name without some reason. The statement made by Lord Palmerston in this House had been received with cheers, and gave the greatest satisfaction out-of-doors. The feelings and sympathies of England were roused not only by the way in which a small Power like Denmark had been stripped of her possessions, not only by the intimate connection which had taken place through a Royal marriage, not only by the feeling of the people of this country regarding the breaking of treaties, but also by the prospect of the difficulties that might arise hereafter. It was stated in the House at the time that if the King of Prussia and his troops went to Copenhagen and took the King of Denmark prisoner, this country must save him. Yet after that language the spirit of the treaty was broken through: France did not act with us, having been treated by Lord Russell with some disrespect. The Emperor of the French having demanded a Congress to take into consideration the Treaties of 1815, Lord Russell, instead of giving the Emperor of the French some answer to gratify his vanity, told his Imperial Majesty—he did not doubt with truth—what was disagreeable at the time. Hon. Gentlemen were smiling; but there were unpleasant truths, and there was a pleasant and an unpleasant way of telling them, and it was enough to say that Lord Russell had not that conciliatory manner which distinguished the present Foreign Secretary. The Emperor was irritated by that answer, while by an additional misfortune our Ambassador in Paris did not receive the despatch which declined the proposition for a Conference so as to communicate it to M. Drouyn de l'Huys until it had been published in the English papers. It might be said that this was a small matter; but many small matters made up a great offence. It was hardly too much to say that but for this accident, and Lord Russell's want of tact, the Emperor of the French would still have been upon the Throne of France; but for that the Emperor would have joined us in resisting the spoliation of Denmark; that mighty Power which was now domineering over Europe would never have been built up; and the present war would never have broken out. Of course what he was stating was open to objection, and certainly to doubt; he meant "doubt," because what he said was only an opinion of his own. He must state his opinion that this country had not from the year 1863 kept up the position that she ought to have maintained as a great Power, and she had retrograded in the councils of Europe. From the gist of the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) it appeared he had gone through the Blue Book with considerable assiduity. He (Viscount Royston) had not waded over the whole of the volume, and what was more he did not intend to do so. He noticed that hon. Gentlemen often came down to the House and treated Members with extracts from Blue Books which they might read at leisure for themselves. He would not do so; he would only give his opinion that what he had read in the Blue Book had convinced him that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had been a straightforward one—a policy of neutrality, to which, however disagreeable to foreign countries, it was necessary in our own interest to adhere. He would ask the right hon. Member for Tamworth what he would propose that the Government should do? Would he wish the Minister for Foreign Affairs to have gone to the Chancellor of the North German Confederation and say that if he repelled the invasion by France we should go to war with Germany, or have gone to France and say if the French repelled the invasion of the Germans we would go to war with them? We held a comfortable position with regard to ourselves, and he did not think it was desirable to go and meddle with the quarrel of two great Powers—a quarrel that we never could have stopped, because it had been brewing for years. It had been brewing on the part of France since 1815, and France had only been waiting for an opportunity to make its rush at the throat of Prussia. He had lived in France and had seen a great deal of French society, and he was in France at the time when the Luxemburg difficulty took place. Then mediation was asked, it was given, and it succeeded. Prussia had never been an aggressive Power—["Oh, oh!"]. His hon. Friends had not heard what he was going to say—she had never been aggressive outside what she considered her own sphere. She had a scheme for the unification of Germany, which dated far beyond the time of the present distinguished Chancellor at the head of the Prussian affairs. It dated as far back as the Ministry of M. Hardenberg, who took part in negotiating the Treaty of 1815. He himself (Viscount Royston) reprobated what had taken place in Germany; yet Germany had a scheme of its own, and it was owing to the assiduity and vigour and talent of the Chancellor of the North German Confederation that it had been now carried out. But the difficulties of that scheme were only now beginning. With regard to North Germany, the work was probably easy; but with regard to Southern Germany, where the religion and the political feeling of the people were different, it was more probable that the task would be found a difficult one. What would the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth propose should have been done? That was the simple question which every thinking man in this country would put. What could this country have done to have carried out the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Auberon Herbert's) policy? He had raised the discussion which he (Viscount Royston) hoped might be profitable. The hon. Gentleman sympathized with France, and so did he (Viscount Royston); but he had seen more of France than the hon. Gentleman, though not under the trying circumstances in which he had so kindly and honourably distinguished himself. He had watched the progress of feeling in France, and, associated as he was with one who knew more of French society than any Gentleman in that House or outside its walls—one whose opinion was perfectly well known to the late Lord Clarendon—he could state that that gentleman shadowed forth in letters which might one day see the light of publicity, that the stability of the Government of the Emperor was uncertain, and the advice he gave was that the Napoleonic dynasty was trembling on an uncertain foundation. We had been told that the Emperor had done all the mischief—that he was the cause of all the evils which had occurred. It could not be denied that the Emperor was responsible to the people of France for every step he had taken with regard to war; but neither could it be denied that there was a force behind which impelled him forward, and the moment the Emperor let the French people slip out of his hand—as he had acknowledged it had—his doom was certain. Knowing the character of the French people, he (Viscount Royston) did not think that they would have crumbled away with as much facility as their Emperor; but in six months a nation of 36,000,000 was utterly crushed, three armies were taken prisoners, they never won one single action, they had not produced one general with a head, and they had not been able to raise a Minister capable of conducting the national affairs. He asked whether it was conceivable, in the hallucinations of any mind whatever, to imagine such a prostration as had been witnessed within the last six months? Britain could aid and sympathize with France, but that was all she could do till she was asked, and when asked—though he was opposed to many of the questions upheld by the Premier and his supporters—he believed she would act worthily of her antecedents. He thought the Government deserved the best thanks of England, and he was confident that when this country could mediate with any chance of success the Government would come forward with heartiness and readiness to perform that office. He trusted that that time was not far distant—because Germany, with amalgamated power and a concentration of forces, rendered it probable that the entire prostration of France, instead of being conducive to the peace of Europe, was certain to incite war. There could be no durable tranquillity on the Continent so long as France was demolished. He could not believe that so farseeing a man as the Chief Minister of the Emperor of Germany could allow himself to dictate such terms of peace as could not be performed. It would be useless to demand ten milliards of francs; it would be cruel to take Alsace and Lorraine, and the greater part of the French fleet. When these terms were propagated by the newspapers, and believed in by the gobe-mouches—in which latter category he should not think of placing the right hon. Member for Tamworth, although he was startled when he heard that right hon. Baronet quoting a proclamation which, he said, had been posted upon the walls of certain cities, as emanating from Prince Charles, who as a practical general could never have been guilty of such pettishness and childishness—they naturally created a great sensation. But he did hope that the terms of peace—which must be severe, seeing that Germany must defend herself against future aggression by sufficient securities—would soon be adjusted. The fact was that the French people had brought the war upon themselves. No man—not even the Emperor himself—had done more to incite a war feeling than M. Thiers, both in the Chamber of Deputies and out of it. M. Thiers had been elected by 19 different constituencies, which constituencies had evidently a higher opinion of the French Minister than he (Viscount Royston) could ever form. Personally, M. Thiers had brought as much misery upon his unhappy country as any Minister connected with the Empire. In the fortifications of Paris alone he was responsible for the expenditure of 200,000,000 of francs, besides bringing upon the capital the misfortunes and horrors of the late siege. France had not only slipped out of the hands of the late Emperor, but out of everybody's hands. But we in this country should not be led away by maudlin and philanthropic sentiment. That France was in a wretched and deplorable state was too true; but our assistance should only be given when it was asked, because volunteered it would only bring reprobation on ourselves, and never elicit any gratitude from France. He hoped the Motion would not be pressed to a Division. The best wishes of Britain were with France—the people of this country would do all in their power to alleviate the sufferings of France; but we should not be forced into a policy which might bring destruction upon ourselves, and no benefit to those upon whose behalf we intervened.

MR. HORSMAN: There is one objection to this Resolution which my hon. Friend (Mr. A. Herbert), who has moved it with so much earnestness and feeling and so much ability, must feel is calculated to render it so unacceptable to the House, that I hope he will be satisfied with the discussion he has raised, and not take a Division upon it. That objection is that this Motion would drive the Government to abandon the position of neutrality which they have taken up in accordance with the feelings and wishes of the country at large. So far as this particular Blue Book is concerned, I cannot entertain the same view of the policy of the Government as is taken by some of my hon. Friends. The Government have had a very difficult duty to discharge. They have had, first, themselves to take up an attitude of neutrality; and they had, secondly, what was not a less responsible duty—to localize the war and to induce by their influence other parties to adopt the same policy. I have read with great attention the despatches alluded to by my hon. Friends, and I have observed the pressure put upon the Government to induce them to take up what I think was termed “the resolute and determined attitude” pressed upon them by M. Thiers and others. I am sure I shall receive the concurrence of many on both sides the House when I say that nothing is so contagious as war; and that if the Government had yielded to the pressure brought to bear upon them from various quarters we might have found ourselves the moving cause of a general European conflagration. I therefore, for my part, entirely approve and concur in their refusal of what M. Thiers asked. Moreover, I think that such a course as that suggested by the hon. Gentleman, while embarrassing to this country, would be unjust to Germany; for what would be the purport and intent of this Resolution if carried? I heard the other day—almost with apprehension—an Answer given by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to the hon. Member for Nottingham, in which, I think, he said that the terms of peace were a matter of watchful concern to the Government of England. Even that was going further, I thought, than was consistent with the view they had adopted; because how was it to be followed up? Did it mean that we were to give unpalatable advice to Prussia? It certainly could not mean that we were to deal in threats; but if we, in concert with other Powers, once take upon ourselves to remonstrate and recommend, we do not know how soon we may be pressed into dictating terms of peace; and I want to know what answer we are likely to get from Count Bismarck if this position should be assumed? Count Bismarck has a very easy answer, which, I am afraid, has not been thoroughly considered. I am, and always have been, as anxious as anyone for peace, and should be very glad to hear that Germany had abandoned her claim to

Alsace and Lorraine; but we must look at the matter from the German point of view as well, and what would Count Bismarck say to us, if we were to tell him he must be content with moderate terms of peace? “Who is to define what moderation means?” he would say—“And remember what position we are now occupying. France began the war; France invaded Germany—not the Emperor only, not the Government only; the Chamber, the Press, the populace all cheered on the war; ‘A Berlin’ was the cry.” My hon. Friend (Mr. A. Herbert) thinks territorial occupation is an immoderate condition of peace; but Count Bismarck may ask in reply—“Who made territorial cession the prize of war?” Was it not France herself? Did she not name the stake? Did not she know that according to all long-standing usage, cession of territory would be the conclusion of the war? Did not both parties go into the war with the acceptance of the condition that the Rhine was to be the prize? And when France herself laid down the stakes shall she not pay the forfeit? But when Count Bismarck first spoke to Jules Favre about the cession of territory, what did Jules Favre say?—“Sir,” said he, “do you know you are speaking to a Frenchman?” “Yes,” Count Bismarck might have said, “I know that I am speaking to one of that nation that has always coveted the Rhine, and that went to war on purpose to take the Rhine.” Count Bismarck says, in one of his despatches—“I have found it impossible to make M. Jules Favre understand that the honour of France is of the same quality as the honour of other nations.” And this, Sir, it is that has been fatal to France; she has been the victim of her own delusions. What is the truth? The war was practically concluded at Sedan: and the question is often asked—Why was not peace concluded at Sedan? We are told the other night that the King of Prussia began the war by announcing that he warred against the French Emperor, not against the French people; then, why was not peace made at Sedan? Why did the King of Prussia re-commence the war, and, at that time, against the French people? Because, before he could even speak of peace the Government was changed, and, through the mouths of its two most eminent members, declared the war should go on.

M. Jules Favre's first act was to declare that "not an inch of territory should be ceded nor the stone of a fortress be forfeited;" and M. Gambetta exclaimed—

"Vanquished as we have been, we will not for one moment entertain conditions of peace until every German soldier has left our country; we will not even talk of peace as long as the soil of France is polluted by a German foot."

I would not say one word in disparagement of a great nation in misfortune. I sympathize with—I commiserate France in her misfortune; but, Sir, I commiserate France most of all that, in her misfortune, she fell into the hands of those two men, who are more responsible for the bloodshed we deplore than any German who has invaded her soil. If France has been humiliated—if she has been devastated—if she has been exhausted—those who are responsible for her condition are the men who deluded her by those vainglorious, bombastic, mendacious proclamations in which they did not themselves believe. Of Germany, I would say that, although I should be glad to see peace concluded without France being too much humiliated, I think we are liable to err greatly if we conclude, as is commonly done, that Germany has shown herself so immeasurably the superior of France that she is safe for all time to come, and may part with those securities which she thinks necessary for her defence; because it is impossible to deny that Germany has had unusual advantages in this war which she can never hope to have again. In the first place, France, anticipating that she would surprise Germany, was surprised herself. Germany had the finest army the world has ever seen, in a perfect state of preparation. The war had been foreseen and prepared for by a statesman of great sagacity, and every movement of the campaign was directed by a military genius unequalled in our time, and, perhaps, not surpassed in any other. But another generation of Germans may not have a statesman such as Bismarck or a general equal to Moltke. If France had had a statesman like Bismarck and a general like Moltke, where would Germany be now? The fortunes of war would, perhaps, have been reversed. The present misfortunes of France are not traceable to the quality of the French troops. Had the generals been changed the march of the French to Berlin might have been as certain as that of the Germans has been to Paris. These are circumstances we must take into account; and Germany from a German point of view has a right to say—"We must have security for the future." I was sorry to hear the right hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) speak of the unification of Germany as a misfortune to Europe. I take the opposite view. I am one of those who think that Cavour did a great work for Italy, and that Bismarck has done a great work for Germany. The memory of Cavour will be honoured as long as Italy exists; and the name of Bismarck will, in future times, be mentioned with honour throughout Germany and through the world. I myself believe that the unification of Germany is a new guarantee of peace for Europe. Germany has never been an aggressive Power. I am not here to defend the German aggression on Denmark. In this House I went further than any man to press the Government to defend Denmark; but examine the history of all the greatest men, and tell me how many are there whose career is without a blot. I will say nothing of France upon this point; but I insist that if you take the whole history of Germany you must say she has not been an aggressive Power. While, therefore, Sir, I admire the generous spirit which dictated this Resolution, and acknowledge that there could not be found a more fitting mouthpiece for the sentiments of which it is the expression, I do trust my hon. Friend will rest satisfied with the consciousness that he has well discharged the duty he was impelled to undertake, and that he will not put the House in the very false position we should be in if obliged to divide upon his Motion.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he thought some of the remarks made in this debate were quite uncalled for; and in particular he protested against the construction the right hon. Member for Tamworth had put upon the departure of Lord Lyons from Paris. Lord Lyons left the city at the earnest solicitations of M. Jules Favre, in order that he might be in full communication with Her Majesty's Government. The position of Mr. Washburne in no degree resembled that held by Lord Lyons, and his conduct could not be dictated by the same considerations. He again protested in the warmest manner against any adverse construction being placed on the departure of Lord Lyons from Paris with the Government of the country to which he was accredited. Lord Lyons was no more capable of deserting his post in a time of danger than his gallant father would have been of deserting his ship.

SIR HENRY LYTTON BULWER said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had anticipated the few observations he should have wished to make in reference to Lord Lyons. He thought nothing would have been more injudicious than that Lord Lyons, Her Majesty's Ambassador in France, should have remained in Paris when it was absolutely necessary for the transaction of business that he should accompany the other foreign Representatives who were leaving the capital. It was perfectly clear that the Representatives of Switzerland or Brazil might remain in Paris without injuring their Governments; but it was perfectly clear also that nothing would have been more injurious to the interests of the British Government than that Lord Lyons, from any false sense of honour should have remained in Paris when his presence would be far more useful elsewhere. He desired to say a very few words with respect to the special Motion now before the House. He entirely sympathized with the sentiment of his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Herbert); but he could not approve of his Motion. Of two things one was certain—either the Prussian Government meant to act with justice and moderation, in which case we should, only by a sort of indirect menace, place an obstacle in the way of its doing so; or else it meant to act with injustice and exorbitance, in which case it was advisable that they should have the facts before them, and not proceed in the dark upon a mere hypothesis. Moreover, supposing they were to agree to the Motion of his hon. Friend—to whose ability as well as to whose sentiments he begged to pay a merited compliment—what then? Who should decide what would be moderation on the part of Germany?—who should decide what was contrary to the independence of France, or to the security of Europe? Why, the very moment after they had voted unanimously for the Resolution of his hon. Friend, when the case to which he referred was brought before them, they would be found perhaps essentially to disagree. His hon. Friend thought that to take the smallest portion of territory from France would be an act of injustice. There were, on the other hand, many who thought that, after Germany had been exposed to a war which was unjustly brought upon her, even were she to exact Alsace and Lorraine, she would only be repaid for the suffering she had undergone. He thought, for himself, if Germany would be satisfied with the possession of Alsace, and let France retain Metz, that would be a very fair arrangement. Well, with all these differences of opinion, would it not be absurd for them to make a declaration in words which signified nothing clear in ideas? Besides, what would this declaration result in? He confessed, indeed, in reading the Motion of his hon. Friend he was somewhat reminded of a very old story told of one of Mr. Speaker's predecessors. One of those inquisitive foreigners who were anxious to inquire into our institutions asked the Speaker of the House of Commons of that time what he would do if some refractory Member persisted on speaking out of his turn. The Speaker said "I would call him to order." "Well," rejoined the foreigner, "but supposing he did not attend to your admonition, what would you do then?" "Why," answered the Speaker, "I would name him." "But," continued the foreigner, "supposing he did not attend even to that very solemn warning, what would you do then?" "God Almighty only knows!" exclaimed the Speaker; "I am sure I do not." Well, what were we to do now. Supposing Germany was to do something exceedingly unjust, something that would deprive France of her independence and menace the security of Europe, and we had expostulated and she had disregarded our expostulations—what was to follow? Would it be enough to say, as this Resolution says, we did not approve of such conduct? On the other hand, if she were to act with scruple and generosity, was it worth while to have said anything? It seemed to him that this Motion said too little or too much. If we were to condemn, let us know what we were to condemn; if we were to praise, let us know what we were to praise. Our words come too late to prevent anything, too soon to judge anything. We could not be always talking, and he thought it better, therefore, that we should only talk when we could do so with reason or with effect. In conclusion, he trusted his hon. Friend would be satisfied with the discussion he had originated, and would not press his Motion further.

SIR HENRY HOARE thought that any French patriot who had heard the expressions of sympathy with their country which had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Cambridgeshire (Viscount Royston), and the right hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman), must have exclaimed—"Save us from our friends!" The question before the House was, whether it was the duty, and, he might add, the interest, of that assembly to plead the cause of France, when France was too prostrate to say anything for herself. A French gentleman of good position, well known in English circles, and not responsible in any way for the sad position in which his country now found itself, remarked to him the other day—"We must accept the terms of peace, whatever they may be, for we have nothing left—neither armies, nor generals, nor munitions, nor finances. We trust to your country and to Europe. We trust you will see that it is for your interest and the interest of Europe that you should leave to us at least some semblance of independence." It had been urged that they should let this question alone, because France, being prostrate, could do nothing for herself, and they would only anger the Prussians by saying anything on her behalf. He had also heard it said that, because France threw herself at the throat of Prussia, she must meet in silence her condign punishment, and we must hold our hands. But then came the question—Had we any moral influence, and could we exert our moral influence when we were determined to back it up by nothing else? He would remind the Prime Minister that the loudest cheers which greeted his policy of non-intervention came from the Benches behind him, where sat the representatives of the peace-at-any-price policy—those who had declared, in meetings at Manchester and other places, that under no circumstances, except the invasion of this country, would they go to war. ["No!"] Yes; and one Member behind him had already proposed to reduce the Army by the 20,000 men whom the Government had raised to increase it. Judging those Gentlemen by their actions and their words, they thought the foreign policy of this country should be one of isolation, weakness, and "effacement." ["No!"] He held that it was our interest to endeavour, by moral influence, or by any means in our power that could be exerted beneficially, to secure for France some decent terms of peace. In August last he predicted in that House that the rupture of the alliance with France would put them in this position—that they would have Russia in Constantinople, and the Alabama claims again cropping up. The position of England in Europe at the present was as though she had had a rupture with France, for France was annihilated and could not act as her ally; and we found that Russia had withdrawn from the Treaty of Paris; that Prussia immediately afterwards gave notice that she no longer held herself bound by the Treaty of Luxemburg, and he thought there existed strong reason to believe that these two Powers had come to an understanding for the future partition of Europe when favourable circumstances arrived. It had been the policy of this country to protect Belgium, and to suspect that the only danger impending over her came from France; but, in his opinion, danger was as imminent from united Germany when ruled by a despotic Power as it had ever been from France, where there had always been a strong section of the people willing to stand up in defence of constitutional government. Now that Germany was united she would require a large seaboard, and did not this threaten danger to Holland and the Colony of Heligoland? Some people contended that it was not to the advantage of England to preserve Heligoland; but she could not tamely give up except by general consent anything she held by the faith of a treaty. What he contended was, that Her Majesty's Government ought to use moral influence if they possessed it, and if they saw terms proposed which would, if accepted, have the effect of annihilating France, to consult every class in the community as to the course to be pursued, instead of depending simply on the representatives of the easy-going classes who defend the policy of peace-at-any-price, maintaining that cotton is king, and that trade and commerce are the only things in the world worthy of protection. He felt strongly on this question, because he had himself seen the miseries which France had suffered in consequence of the war, and because he had helped the party of which he just spoke to settle many questions in which the interests of the people generally were concerned. There were many hon. Members in the House who were equally in favour of protecting the rights of the working classes with the representatives of "peace-at-any-price," but who would not help those representatives in their endeavours to disestablish England and destroy its proper influence in the Councils of Europe? He was morally convinced that at the present moment England stood in a very critical position. With France annihilated and Germany consolidated England would have to do battle within the next ten years without a single ally for her liberal institutions; and she would have also to fight for the independence of Turkey, of Belgium, of Holland, and of the Scandinavian nations. Of course, great doubt might be thrown on the conceptions or belief of any Member of the House; but such he held to be the peril before this country. Therefore Her Majesty's Ministers ought, in his opinion, to use every means at their command to save France from her present position; for, by so doing, they would place this country in such a position that she would not have to cast her eyes over Europe for help in vain in her own day of trouble and in the time of European conflagration.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Bulwer) had asked who was to decide as to what were moderate terms of peace?—and it must be confessed that abstractedly the question was one difficult to answer, but a reference to historical precedents might be of assistance. Let them look back to the pages of history, and see what was the course pursued in former days after wars more severe and terrible than the one they hoped had now come to an end. In 1814, when the Emperor Alexander entered Paris, he said—

"It is not against the French nation I have made war, but against Napoleon. He has carried fire and sword through our country; he has devastated, he has penetrated to the very heart of my empire, sacrificed my people, burnt my cities. The justice of God has brought me to-day to the foot of those ramparts whence the enemy took their departure, and now my only object will be to reconcile France with other nations."

Again, M. Talleyrand, supported by the Duke of Wellington, said—

"The Sovereigns will respect the integrity of France, such as it was. They will do more, for they hold to the opinion that it is essential to the happiness of Europe that France should be great and strong."

These extracts were his answer to the question of the right hon. Baronet. He did not wish to discuss the question from the French or German point of view, but he held with the right hon. Baronet the senior Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) that they should regard it from that point of view which comprehended the interests of England; and, holding that opinion, he thought the language of M. Talleyrand laid down the true principle on which peace should be made on the present occasion. If Prussia crushed and humbled France too much, it would lay the basis of great danger in the future. A very clever pamphleteer recently wrote—

"Will it not be advisable to accept a peace with conditions however severe, but which, while they leave us conquered, leave us full of energy and resource prepared to take our revenge at the very first opportunity?"

This would undoubtedly result if France were too hard pressed now, instead of having offered to her terms of peace which she could accept with honour. With regard to the question of indemnity, he could not imagine that any great nation like Germany would make its victory the ground for utterly crushing a country with which it had been at war, by demanding a money indemnity so enormous as to absorb all the wealth of the country. With regard to the question of ceding territory to Germany, he thought that the cession of Alsace and Lorraine would leave the germ of a war which would certainly break out between the two countries in the future. And then he could not see on what plea Alsace and Lorraine were alone demanded, and why the proposed cession should not extend, if there must be a cession, to the whole of Northern France. In 1815 we did not allow territory to be taken from France. The cession of Lorraine to France was made some 130 years ago, when Fleury was Minister, and, therefore, he thought it absurd to regard the two provinces as being German. Again, another feature in the case which strengthened the right of France to Alsace and Lorraine, was that after the cession she paid a large annual sum to the ceding Power. The proposition before the House was, in his opinion, a very moderate one, and he did not think it at all unreasonable to ask for its acceptance by the Government. The despatches of Earl Granville, doubtless, contained expressions indicative of the natural courtesy of his mind:—but it was shown, and he regretted it, by answers to Questions in this House bearing on the subject of the war and by the despatches laid on the Table of the House that Her Majesty's Government were opposed to intervention of any kind—in fact, the Blue-book was pervaded by the idea—"Let them fight it out," notwithstanding that others of the neutral Powers were prepared to assist England in the work of bringing about an honourable peace. The commonest humanity would lead a man to prevent one person ill-using another in the street; and yet when Government was called upon to take some action in the present difficulty, they seemed possessed by the idea that any action on their part would do more harm than good. But he (Mr. Cochrane), for one, altogether failed to see what harm could arise from Her Majesty's Government taking the line of action laid down in the proposition now before the House. But there was a stronger point for interference than that—we had interfered; and how? Earl Granville wrote to the Turkish Ambassador to say that we insisted that neither of the two Powers between whom such interchange of letters was made should depart from its neutrality in the present war, without a previous communication of ideas and an announcement to one another of such change of policy with regard to neutrality. That was a mode of interference that had never been heard of before. Similar notes were addressed to Austria, Portugal, Spain, Greece, the Hague, Belgium, and Sweden. Even if one of the Powers had an opportunity of interfering it could not interfere at all, because Earl Granville took upon himself to tie them all up. They were not to move till he moved, and then he said—"I will not move at all." He thought that was a most questionable thing for Earl Granville to have done. His reason for rising was simply to urge that it was important to the interests of this country that our Government should now express some interest in the terms of peace. Count Bismarck said the other day—

"For the future, people will not ask what is the opinion of Europe, but what is the opinion of Prussia."

It is not a pleasant prospect for us to have to decide on the policy of Count Bismarck. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I was not aware that such an expression had fallen from Count Bismarck. Where does it appear that he said so?] It would be found in a despatch which he should, no doubt, be able to discover, and would hand to the right hon. Gentleman. Were we not interested in the question of Germany becoming such a great Power? Suppose that Germany should interfere with the neutrality of Belgium? If we were not interested in this question, why had it been proposed that our Army should be increased? Why should we add three millions to our military expenses? This showed that the views of the Government had changed, and that they did not feel so secure as they had done. We might increase our Army as much as we pleased, but the real security of this country really was in its high moral standing, in its possessing the confidence of foreign countries, and the perception that it was always actuated by the feelings of justice, humanity, and dignity.

MR. MUNTZ said, that, referring to an observation that had been made with regard to the magnanimity of the Emperor Alexander, he wished to mention that he struck away from France 8,000,000 of people, of Belgium and other provinces, who had been French for years, and that he claimed to take and kept to this day the whole of Poland, with the exception of the Grand Duchy of Posen and the part of Galicia now belonging to Austria; and he governed Poland with a ruthless policy such as was scarcely known in the annals of the world. As to the question immediately before the House, he thought the hon. Member had brought forward a Resolution which indicated rather what we should not than what we should do. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) found fault with the Government for everything they had done. Now he (Mr. Muntz) was of a very different opinion. What were the facts? Before the commencement of the war, after the Prince of Hohenzollern had withdrawn his candidature, Earl Granville did everything in his power to induce the French Emperor to abstain from declaring war. The answer he got was one of ordinary courtesy and nothing further. After the first reverse of the French another application was made; and we were told to mind our own business—that France wanted no mediator. After the extraordinary surrender of Sedan and the dethronement of the Emperor it was perfectly true that M. Jules Favre did talk of peace—but upon what terms? He said that the Republic willed peace, but that they would never surrender one inch of their territory or one stone of their fortresses—that there should be no peace while a single foreigner remained in France, or her soil was polluted by a single German foot. Of course, Earl Granville acted very properly in stating that as long as France maintained that position England could not interfere. M. Thiers made pretty much the same declaration, for he said when a soil had once become French it remained French for ever. His position was that France had a right to make war for conquest, and if defeated retire without loss, for French soil was inviolable. What would France have done if she had been successful in this war? In that event the country on the left bank of the Rhine would have been annexed to France, and no one in France would have cried out against the injustice of doing it. M. Thiers, in his Consulate and the Empire, said when the whole left bank of the Rhine had been annexed to France, that Germany began war against France—which by-the-by was not true—and that if a nation which declared war lost its territory, no one had a right to complain. How, with this opinion, could he now complain of what had happened to his own country? Why were the Paris Forts built? To cover an attack, which at the time was actually intended to be made on Germany, and which was merely put off in consequence of the Quadruple Alliance. And these forts, that were built for the purpose of aggression on a neighbouring people, had proved to be instruments of misery and horror to the French. Then, it was not for them to complain. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Herbert) found fault with Her Majesty's Government. He (Mr. Muntz) did not profess always to vote for the Government, but, having read carefully the Blue Book on the subject, he did not know what better course they could have adopted than that which they did adopt. He thought they had acted with wonderful discretion. They had kept us free from all reproach—from all the troubles of war; and neither party could find fault with us hereafter, for they could not find fault with us now—which was the best proof of the perfect neutrality of Her Majesty's Government. Suppose, when war was first threatening, the English Government had said to the Emperor—"We will not allow this war of aggression on a neighbouring Power, and if you persist you must take the consequences." That Mr. Pitt would have said so 70 years ago, under the same circumstances, he thought very likely. But if we had tried that game it is just possible that, with the aid of Italy and Austria, we might have been successful in preventing war. It was possible. But if we had what would have been the result? The eternal hatred of the French people. On the other hand, if we had not been successful we should have been involved in a war of which we might never see the end, and all from a Quixotic desire to meddle with the affairs of others. But if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had adopted that policy he had reason to believe that the British people—or even that House—would not have supported him; for the feelings of the House and the nation were very different now to what they were in the time of Mr. Pitt; there was no longer that hatred of the French people which prevailed at that time, for both nations had learnt to live together as friends instead of being continually at loggerheads. Coming now to another question, it appeared rather harsh to say anything in favour of one nation taking part of the territory of another; but before the French people made good their claim to retain Alsace and Lorraine against the Prussian demand to take them away let them come into court with clean hands—let them give up Savoy and Nice. Within these ten days there had been a revolt against them in Nice which had to be put down by force. It is true there had been a plébiscite for Savoy and Nice, which showed a great unanimity in favour of the French; but when it was about to be taken 40,000 troops were marched into the territory, the ballot boxes were made safe, and everything was done to secure a majority. Therefore, unless the French Republic, having come by those provinces by accident, showed now that it was willing to give them up it would have no claim itself not to be treated as a conquered country. We had been told that Italy and Austria had offered their assistance. But in what way? By moral influence—to which neither the one belligerent nor the other would listen. Suppose our moral influence came to nothing, were we to bark without biting? Nothing could discredit a nation more. We did that in the case of Denmark, and he could conscientiously say that for some time after he was ashamed to show his face abroad, because it was said — “You English threaten, but dare nothing.” If we had been prepared to interfere we must also have been prepared to go to war with such assistance as we could get from Austria and Italy. But with the immense armies on the side both of the French and Prussians nothing short of 150,000 men on our part would have been of the slightest avail. Where were they to come from? We might turn out 40,000 or 50,000 men, but it would take three or four years before we could put into the field such a force as would make an impression either on the French or Prussian armies. The policy of England of late years had been not to intermeddle in the affairs of Continental States. Therefore, considering that Her Majesty’s Government had done all they could, that any interference would only produce harm, and, perhaps, make enemies on both sides, he hoped the House would see the necessity of rejecting the Resolution, which would merely encourage false hopes on the part of the French people which could not be realized, and prevent them from making peace, so essential to their own welfare and the tranquillity of Europe.

MR. CORRANCE thought that the present discussion would be received by the Government with some satisfaction, because up to this time it seemed to him that the voice of the country on this war had been but feebly represented in Parliament. Throughout the whole of this memorable winter the English people, in their homes and families, had almost represented the internecine war which was then raging between Prussia and France, and they naturally expected that when Parliament met it would give some utterance to their feelings. But what was the result? When the House met there were only two speeches of any importance made. No doubt they were admirable speeches, and effectually sufficient for the occasion. But wherever he went he heard nothing but expressions of disappointment at the silence of the British Parliament on a subject which the whole country had so much at heart. From the peculiar position in which the Government were placed at the time he knew what a difficult task it was for them to shape a policy. In the admirable speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. Herbert) the feelings of the people generally were well represented; the House, he thought, was much indebted to him for the opportunity now afforded to the representatives of the people for the expression of their opinions. This was a question of the attitude and conduct of the British Government. The attitude taken by the people had been noble. They had filled up the gap which they felt had existed in the policy of the Government by unexampled contributions. They could do no more—they would do no less. It appeared to him that this debate had diverged rather widely from the issue that had been submitted to the House. The discussion had been turned into one relating to the comparative merits of Prussia and France in commencing this war. Some hon. Members were disposed to throw all the blame upon France, whilst others were as strongly censured the ambition of Prussia. He should candidly admit that the attitude of France for many years past had been anything but satisfactory, and their policy, a policy of aggression. But whilst confessing that fact, what were they to say of Prussia? Was Prussia so lamb-like and peaceful-minded during the last few years? Was she so essentially German as some persons had represented? He doubted it. He had had some acquaintance with Germany, having resided there many years. He knew that the great German people were both intellectual and peaceable; but he believed the very contrary to be true of the Prussians. The right hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) said that Prussia was non-aggressive. Now, he should like to know in what sense could the hon. Gentleman say that Prussia was non-aggressive? Was she not a partner in the partition of Poland? Was she not a partner in the conspiracy against Schleswig-Holstein? And was she not at the present moment a determined candidate for the possession of Alsace and Lorraine? Was that, he asked, a policy of non-aggression? Added to that, when they found that she set herself up as a great military dynasty—was not that a policy in utter opposition to the principles of the great Liberal party of this country? What had been the career of Prussia since 1848? It had been one in direct antagonism to the constitutionalism of Europe and immediately to the constitution of Frankfort. Tracing the history of Prussia upwards from 1848 they found its policy one of aggression. In 1862 and 1866 the intentions of Count Bismarck were admittedly to stifle the freedom of discussion in the Prussian Chambers, and for four successive years he levied taxes on the people without the assent of the Chambers. Did such a policy as that meet with the assent of the great Liberal party of England? Nor did it end there. As soon as the unprovoked war with Denmark was over, Count Bismarck turned his attention to the great war with Austria, which ended at Sadowa. Was that a policy of non-aggression? Was that a policy to be approved of by the great Liberal party of England? Nothing astonished him more than the attitude of the great Liberal party in this case. But it was the same in the days of the first Napoleon. Mr. Fox supported the policy of Napoleon until he had conquered the whole of Europe, and the Liberals of the present day were in danger of falling into the same error with regard to Prussia. Great excuses were, no doubt to be made for any short-comings on the part of Her Majesty's Government. They came into office to represent a distinct policy of non-intervention. There was scarcely a Member of that Government who did not come in with that policy written upon his flag-staff. Well, what did that policy mean? It meant this—that both Parliament and the country were utterly disgusted with the former conduct of our foreign affairs—with our conduct with regard to Denmark—with our protocols in regard to Poland; and there was a general understanding that unless we intended to back up our representations by military force, the only sound policy was one of non-intervention. Well, that, at all events, was intelligible. But he wanted to know whether the Government would consider the policy which had in view the suppression of France one that the people of England would tolerate? Count Bismarck had suppressed a portion of Denmark, because he found it too Liberal in its principles. He had also suppressed the Diet of Frankfort because it was too Liberal. Was it likely that it would continue to tolerate Switzerland and Holland? He asked whether it was not wise and politic on the part of Her Majesty's Government to use all their endeavours in time to avert the catastrophe that seemed impending over Europe generally? He did not mean to express any blame of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues—indeed, it seemed to him impossible that they could have interfered effectually between the two belligerents whilst they were engaged in such deadly hostilities against each other; but now that there was a pause in the operations of the war—now that this country was fully awake to the dreadful horrors which had resulted from it—now that France was prepared to make mighty sacrifices in order to obtain peace—he thought that Her Majesty's Ministers could find themselves in a position to vindicate what he conceived to be the true policy of this country.

MR. W. M. TORRENS* said, he had listened with great interest to the speeches which had been made for and against the Motion of his hon. Friend, and he would invite the House to consider fairly its object and aim, and whether the time for useful intercession could, with justice, be said to have elapsed. He used the word "intercession" and not "intervention," for there was the greatest possible difference between the two expressions, as well as between the things which they were intended to denote. His hon. Friend had no idea of urging on the House the expediency of having recourse to a policy of intervention. He was not a man of such levity of speech as to advocate that course, but what he and his hon. Friend desired was, that the Government should consider whether, in the present dreadful position of an old ally, which was in such a state of exhaustion that it could not fairly treat with the victor we should not be doing an act advantageous to ourselves and to Europe if we could bring our influence to bear as intercessors for the independence of France. It might be asked—"How were we to judge what was consistent with the independence of France?" History answered that question. When this country, after the termination of the most fearful struggle in which she had ever been engaged, joined the Representatives of all the European States to decide the settlement of 1815, was not the vital point of discussion that which was consistent or inconsistent with the independence of France, and was not the whole moral influence of England brought to bear with the view of maintaining the independence of a nation which had just inflicted upon us terrible wounds? What had been the result? Fifty-five years of peace—an eternity in politics. What he asked was an enduring alliance, if that was not? He was desirous, therefore, to receive from the Government the assurance that they were engaged in the endeavour of fairly, justly, and reasonably bringing the interests of this country to bear on the present state of affairs, not so much for the sake of France, or for the sake of Germany, as for the sake of the one thing which was so well worth obtaining—a permanent peace in Europe. Now, permanent peace, unless the terms imposed by Prussia in some degree recommended themselves to reasonable men, in France was a hopeless dream. It was not a truce that either France or this country required. It was a lasting peace. France required rest. She might be driven mad, as an individual might be driven mad by oppression. She had been driven mad once before, and all Europe suffered in consequence. It was to be hoped that such a state of things would never occur again for want of some mediator who would procure for her lenient terms. It was not for the benefit of Germany herself that she should not show lenity. There might be a war party in that country for all he knew; but the tillers of the soil and the workers at the loom in Germany had no interest in imposing terms on France which Frenchmen must ever regard with a sense of humiliation. It was the duty of the Government to decide what should be regarded as fit and moderate terms of peace; and it was of moment to us that

France should start afresh not dreaming of revenge, but that she should be restored to her proper place in the assembly of nations. A friend of his who left the French capital but a few hours ago confirmed what he had heard from others, that over her melancholy joy at the prospect of peace there crept a chill of terror unspeakable at the apprehension of the victors insisting on a triumphal march along the Boulevards. No reasoning or precaution could insure that perilous cavalcade against interruption by some desperate man whose home had been made desolate, and who thirsted madly for revenge. He envied not the brain or heart that did not sicken at the contemplation of the possible consequences, or who would not rejoice in bearing a part, ever so small, in averting them. But how could that be done? Only, so far as he knew, by the intercession, not intervention, of the neutral Powers, whose good opinion, after all, the victorious monarch could but desire to win. Surely, we had been abstinent enough in tendering our good offices. Officially, we had not muttered between our teeth a hint of interference. Should it be said that while the safety of the fairest city in the world and 2,000,000 people was at stake, we had not the pluck to ask if they might be spared a provocation which any madman might convert into wholesale carnage? It was said that it was too late to interpose, as peace was certain. But what sort of peace? Physically, France had been brought so low that at the present moment she was unable to hold out for terms such as reasonable men could expect her to abide by, or such as England had any interest in seeing her compelled to endure. She had, indeed, been vanquished by superior foresight, preparedness, and strategy; but could anyone believe that she was dead. Standing by the prostrate and powerless form of the country he so fondly loved, and of which he used to be so proud, a patriot statesman of France might well exclaim—

"Thou art not conquered; beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson in thy lip, and in thy cheek,
And death's pale flag is not advanced there."

She will awake from her trance which is not either sleep or death; she will arise ere long. But ought not we and every other neighbouring people, for our own sake as for hers, pray devoutly that her awaking may be peaceful, and not with the frantic start of one who burns for revenge; that her closing wounds may not be cankered by the weight of any lingering chain, and that we may see her resume her old place in the society of nations, sitting clothed, and in her right mind. It was not the fashion, upon his side of the House, to speak of Count Bismarck as he was about to do; but his estimate of the character of that eminent person was very different from what so often was confidently launched without sufficient information. A man of Count Bismarck's ambition—a man who had performed such transcendent work in the execution of his aims—was not a man upon whom suggestions of magnanimity were likely to be thrown away. It was hardly conceivable that he should be the man from whom urgent and exacting counsels always proceeded. There was a great work yet before him, and he probably desired the war as heartily at an end as anybody else. He was not certain that if Count Bismarck had had his way he would not have wished the war to finish earlier. For, to the attainment of the pitch of his ambition, and to enable him to carve upon his tomb the inscription, Exegi monumentum ære perennius, a season of peace and prosperity for Germany was indispensable. For these reasons he believed that representations properly made in the name of the Queen and the people of this country would not be thrown away upon a man whose talents, prudence, circumspection, and foresight were probably unrivalled in the present day. Even if he knew beforehand that such representations were certain to fail, he should still think it right to make them. Side by side with the French people it would still be our lot to live, whether they were ground to the earth or allowed to hold up their heads again as free and industrious men. Was it not something to be able to say, even if Frenchmen still were forced to carry about some portion of their bonds, that in the hour of their extremity we did all we could for them? It was always worth while to be right; and it would be a misfortune which none of us could live long enough to forget, or would ever cease to regret, if, through want of intercession on our part, exorbitant terms were imposed upon France. He had listened with surprise to the statement by an hon. Member that the reason why

Earl Granville had declared in his despatch on the 7th of September, that he would not interfere or invite concerted action upon the part of neutrals was because of the ill-starred phrase which escaped from M. Jules Favre. Earl Granville had declined to interpose before that expression was used. Intercession might have been tried and failed; but why not try again? No harm could come of it. Had not our Government been forbearing enough? No one who read the Blue Book as carefully as he had done could say that the Government had risked anything on the part of this country, or suffered themselves to stray from their path through over-zealous attempts at mediation. The Blue Book he could only compare to one of the stone ditches in the West of Ireland, which looked in the distance like solid walls, but when viewed nearer were found to consist merely of stones piled up without mortar or cohesion; the only difference being that you could see through a stone ditch, but this published correspondence could not be seen through, for it embodied merely the darkness of despair. He had never been an advocate or an admirer of a swaggering policy; but he believed that we might have done much, at the time when the second war was beginning, to strengthen the hands of the peaceable and moderate party in the councils of the Prussian King. Had we then said—"If you persist in this war we shall withdraw our Minister, because we wash our hands of the innocent blood that is about to be shed," one of the most eminent Frenchmen, with whom he had the honour of being acquainted, had told him that not only would all France have been perfectly satisfied, but that a fire would have been kindled in Western Europe which even the winner of great battles and the taker of great cities could not have ventured to disregard. What had been the consequences of our inaction? In the course of a very few weeks the Treaty of 1856 had been torn up; the Treaty of Luxemburg had been thrown into the fire; and a fresh insult had been offered to us on the other side of the Atlantic. Our non-interference had only succeeded in lowering our prestige. But the urgent and immediate question which they had now to consider was this—how could France, Germany, England, Belgium, and Italy be saved from the danger which would menace them if such terms were imposed on France as aggravated and kept alive the spirit of revenge in that country? No matter what Government might be set up — Bourbonist, Orleanist, Bonapartist—if excessive terms were imposed on France, in six months after the wounds of the country were healed, that Government would be swept away if it did not give vent to the national sentiment. Nor would this movement be confined to their own soil. Frenchmen would be at work in every discontented country in the world; and great changes had occurred in Europe since last discontent was actively fomented. Steam and telegraphy now-a-days were wonderful instruments in the hands of demagogues, and there was not a country on the Continent where the elements of disturbance were not still smouldering. Apply to those elements the momentum of rankling discontent in France, and who could tell the consequences?

MR. M. T. BASS said, he had no fault to find with the Motion, nor did he think it ill-timed. On the contrary, it was at the moment when the terms of peace were being proposed that our own views could be expressed with most effect; for once the terms had been actually made known, it would be difficult for those who imposed them to yield any point. The Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. A. Herbert), accordingly, was entirely consistent with his high principles of humanity and generous sentiments. For his own part, he had a strong impression that Her Majesty's Government had been too timid in this matter. They had been afraid of doing anything that was likely to give offence to one party or the other. But had we escaped doing so? Had not Prussia expressed her strong disapprobation of our course during the war? and were we not even threatened with the resentment of Germany—a menace which he confessed did not fill him with any very great alarm? As to interference, had not the noble Lord who conducted our Foreign Affairs, at the instance of Prussia questioned Austria as to certain steps which she was about to take; had he not interfered with regard to Denmark; had he not made representations to Italy? If so, it was plain that we had interfered before, and once at the instance of Prussia, and there was nothing to prevent us from expressing our opinion now, when Prussia held back. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had himself laid down the doctrine that there were conditions in which the neutral Powers were not only entitled, but bound to express their opinions upon any matter threatening the general tranquillity and welfare of Europe. That was his own clear conviction. He could conceive France being subdued, subjugated—governed even by Prussia; but he did not believe that if France were partitioned she would ever remain at peace with the rest of the world. It was therefore as much in the interests of Prussia as of the other nations of Europe, that our Government should express to her, in terms consistent with amity, that the more moderation she showed the more satisfactory would be the results. To say that Prussia had anything to fear from France in the future appeared to him to be a paradox and a contradiction in itself. The present war, in his opinion, was due rather to the desire for the unification of Germany than to a wish to get possession of the Rhine provinces; and France had been afraid of the unity of Germany, which had now been accomplished. It appeared to him monstrous, therefore, to assert that Prussia could not be safe without taking provinces from France. It was sometimes urged that to take Alsace and Lorraine was but reasonable; but, if so, why should not Prussia also take Champagne? Supposing such a proposition were to be made, would the right hon. Gentleman and his Government refrain from expressing their disapprobation of such an exaction? To talk about what France would have done was now quite out of date. No doubt, France did very wrong; but if France were compared with Prussia, there really was not a pin to choose between them. It was the old song over again — “Brother, brother, we are both in the wrong.” They had both been the great robbers of Europe. From the time of the Great Frederick, who was the greatest robber that ever existed, Prussia had been plundering her neighbours. He hoped the Government would make such an expression of their desire to obtain moderate terms of peace as would induce the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Herbert) to withdraw his Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is impossible to be surprised that the stifled emotion which every man carries in his breast with reference to the engrossing subject of the present day should have found vent in the debate of this evening, and that the debate should have been continued, not so much with any set purpose, as by the spontaneous action of the hon. Members who have taken part in it. On the part of the Government, as far as the past action of the Government is concerned, I must say I think that with hardly an exception we have nothing to complain of with regard to the manner in which our conduct has been judged by the House. But there is one exception which I cannot refrain from noticing. The noble Lord the Member for the county of Cambridge (Viscount Royston) has rendered his testimony in the handsomest terms to the spirit by which the Government were animated. On our own side my hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid), in a very able speech, made a defence of the Government which I am perfectly content, speaking generally, to abide by; but I am bound to say that, irrespective of coincidence with particular opinions which cannot, of course, be universally asserted where so great a variety of opinions has been expressed, I thank the House for the temper in which our actions and intentions have been judged. And it is but just that I should refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright), who addressed us to-night, for the first time, with that knowledge, ability, and judgment which, from my previous knowledge of him, I fully expected he would bring to bear on any question of this class. And now let me refer for a moment to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), the only speech delivered in this debate which could be generally described as a speech intended to assail the policy and proceedings of the Government. I will not cope with his general assertions, nor will I object to his criticisms upon the language which he states I used on more than one occasion when I said we had "ventured" to do this and we had "ventured" to do that. I do not find that the reports of my speeches in the newspapers sustain the quotations made by my right hon. Friend; but on several occasions I did use that expression, and it appears to me to be a fitting and proper form of expression for a Minister to employ in describing the conduct of his Government in cases where it was not acting in strict right, but expressing opinions on the conduct of others which they were perfectly competent to determine for themselves. I "venture" to assure my right hon. Friend that moderate and deferential language on all occasions, whether among States or individuals, is in itself becoming, and will be found, on the whole, to answer best. But I admit my right hon. Friend did appear to make one point by a reference to the book of despatches on the Table. His charge was that we wrapped ourselves in selfish isolation, and so far he fairly grappled with an expression I used when I said that was the very thing we had forborne to do. He quoted Earl Granville's answer to M. Thiers that "we must judge what was best for ourselves." He left the House under the impression that that was the substance of Earl Granville's reply; and, indeed, no inconsiderable presumption would thence arise that we had taken our own interests for our compass and had paid regard to nothing else. But how does the matter stand? My right hon. Friend ridiculed me a little for being desirous to follow the quotations which he made. Well, my primary motive for that anxiety was respect for the Gentleman who was speaking, because, if it be my duty to render an account of the conduct of the Government, it is also my duty to answer, as fully as I can, any criticism which may be made upon it. In this instance I find reference to the book to be extremely useful, for I find that the representation made by M. Thiers consisted of two parts, one of which was an appeal to us to show our sense of the long alliance between England and France, and the other was that we ought to assert our own place in the Councils of Europe. What did Earl Granville do with reference to the latter part of that appeal? He said, and with the utmost propriety, that "of course we must judge what was best for ourselves." It was in reference to that portion of the appeal of M. Thiers that Earl Granville asserted we ourselves must be responsible. My hon. Friend who brought forward this Motion did so in a speech that was governed by a spirit which made it obvious that motives of humanity and philanthropy dominating over everything else constituted the sole governing principle which led him to submit the Motion to the consideration of the House. My hon. Friend admitted, however—and it was an important admission for him to make—that there was in this book a despatch which, as he said, is in total and utter discord with the rest of the despatches. He quoted a letter of the 16th of October, wherein Earl Granville instructs the British Minister at St. Petersburg confidentially to inquire of Prince Gortchakoff, whether in his opinion it would be possible for England and Russia to come generally to an understanding between themselves as to the terms on which peace might be made, and if his answer should be in the affirmative on that point to further ask him whether he considered there was any possibility of putting a stop to the siege of Paris, if England and Russia, jointly with other neutral Powers, were to make an appeal to Prussia on the one hand, and to recommend moderation to the French Government on the other? The substance of that despatch was transmitted by telegraph to the British Minister at St. Petersburg; who, on the 18th, replied that he had seen Prince Gortchakoff, and that his Excellency had declared, on the part of the Russian Government, that any agreement between the neutral Powers would prove to be a barren and unpractical measure. This refusal on the part of the Russian Government, at that date, stands on record. Now, my hon. Friend cannot fail to see that this was a fact of the utmost importance. My hon. Friend should also bear in mind that the refusal on the part of the Government of Russia was at no long interval followed by the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, relating to the Treaty of 1856. My hon. Friend will at once perceive that, so far from this letter being out of harmony with the spirit of the book, it was an indication of a sincere and anxious intention to act prudently within certain limits, in the hope that an opportunity would be afforded for accomplishing a work of moderation, of justice, and of peace; and that it was only the untoward manner in which it was met, and the yet more untoward circumstances by which at that early date it was followed, that precluded my noble Friend from further developing the spirit and temper of which he had thus given an indication. One word I must say, though the subject has already been most becomingly noticed by my right hon. Friend the junior Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Bulwer). I greatly regretted the reference to Lord Lyons. The language used was “the ungenerous and unmanly flight of Lord Lyons from Paris.” In truth, however, if the flight of Lord Lyons is to be censured, it was not ungenerous or unmanly, for he acted under the direct injunctions of the Government at home, and Lord Lyons can in no sense be held responsible for it. I want to know what would have been our wisdom and prudence, if at the time when the iron circle of investment was about to close round Paris, we had instructed Lord Lyons to remain there, and had made ourselves dependent for our communications with our principal and most trusted agent in France upon the chances of passing through the Prussian lines, and of the replies also passing through those lines, so that three, five, ten, or more days would have been occupied in the passage of communications? It is idle to refer to the case of the Minister of the United States; he was most useful, and performed a most honourable and advantageous part by remaining; but his position was entirely different, because the United States acted upon its traditional policy, wholly avoiding not the general interest of humanity, but that kind of position in regard to an European war which this country has never yet foregone. My right hon. Friend (Sir Robert Peel) seems to think that the primary duty of an Ambassador in Paris is to take care of British subjects resident in Paris; but there cannot be a greater mistake—his primary duty is to take care of the interests of his country; it is a collateral and secondary duty to do all he can for those English people who may have occasion to reside in Paris: but that was not an occasion for any to remain in Paris who could get out of it. My right hon. Friend says that 1,500 or 2,000 English remained in Paris during the siege in its later stage. I can only say that his information is entirely at variance with ours. Nor was Paris left without an English Representative when Lord Lyons came away, because an inferior member of the Embassy remained to discharge those duties on behalf of British subjects which my right hon. Friend supposes were left unattended to. I will not dwell on the general objections which the Mover of the Resolution has taken to the conduct of the Government on account of its negative and neutral character. The question is, what my hon. Friend shall do and what the House shall do with respect to the Resolution he has felt it to be his duty to move? I hope on every ground my hon. Friend will withdraw the Resolution; indeed, it is in the interest of the Resolution itself he should do so, for he will see that it would be impossible to prevail on the House to adopt it. It is perfectly true that we who know and are cognizant of the forms of our own Assembly are quite aware that we should not meet it with a direct negative, but by adopting the Motion to go into Committee of Supply; but the world outside — and not only the English world outside — but other countries, who may observe our proceedings — would not fail to conclude from seeing the small number voting with my hon. Friend that that small number was to be taken as indicating the strength in this House of those who are desirous, if it be possible, to mitigate the misfortunes of France, and to promote the future tranquillity of Europe. Therefore, in the interest of the Motion itself, I earnestly hope my hon. Friend will be disposed to withdraw it. It would not be right that I should pass from the terms of this Motion without reference to what I take to be their intention. My hon. Friend who has just sat down has spoken of the question of to-night, and the points upon which he and the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Horbert) insist are—first, that England is to take upon itself to form at once a combination of neutral Powers, and, second, having succeeded in forming the combination, she shall then proceed to discover the basis upon which peace is to be negotiated. We are not to wait to allow the principals in this awful contest to make the basis for themselves, or even to compare their own ideas of what it should be; but we are to step in and make ourselves, whether they will or not, as far as opinion is concerned, the arbiters of the quarrel. I say “as far as opinion is concerned,” and that construction is very stringently imposed by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens). When he stated that after the battle of Sedan was the time when we might have offered our mediation and influence, I observed that he said he objected to the use of idle words, and that in the event of the rejection of our mediation, and in the event of our failure to make our influence effective, we were to withdraw our Minister from Berlin and close diplomatic relations with the German Empire. Well, my hon. Friend may think that such a conclusion as the extinction of diplomatic relations would form a happy medium between the opposite course of using loud and sonorous language without any effect being given to it, on the one hand, and going to war on the other; but I confess I am not prepared to take so favourable a view of the course he suggests. It appears to me that if we had gone so far as that it would have been difficult indeed not to have proceeded farther; and I think I have some support from the phrase which dropped immediately afterwards from the mouth of my hon. Friend. He said if we had only done that we should have kindled a fire in Western Europe which would have been effectual for the purpose. I am afraid we should have extended the fire that has already been kindled, and that without providing any means that would contribute to the limitation of its range or to the hope of its extinction. In two propositions of the last speaker I, for one, cordially agree. He is full of apprehension lest the peace to be made should be an extorted peace, involving conditions which would be intolerable to the recovered strength of a nation; and such a peace, after so much bloodshed and misery, my hon. Friend contemplates with sentiments of loathing and aversion. I agree with him that the possible arrival of such a peace is one of the unfortunate alternatives that may be before us. I agree with my hon. Friend in this, that the more magnanimity shall be shown by those whose splendid courage and wonderful organization, as well as the great genius of their leaders, have made them victors in this war, the better it will be in every sense not for France alone, nor even for Europe alone, but for the future interests of the German Empire. My hon. Friend also urged his desire that we should make an immediate attempt to use British influence. If the time comes at all it may come suddenly and with very short notice when neutral agency may interpose, and interpose with effect. It was surely a moderate demand which was made by an hon. Member to-night, in defending and apologizing for the conduct of the Government, when he said that, as a condition of intervention between the two belligerents—as a condition of the most friendly and apologetic intervention—the least you can require is that it should be agreeable to, and desired by, one of the two belligerents; but the other night, in answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Herbert), I stated that, so far as we were informed, neither belligerent showed the exact view which has been expressed to-night by my hon. Friend who spoke last, and by the Mover of the Resolution. As far as our information goes, the belligerents do not desire that, by a premature attempt, we should take out of their hands what they appear to think, and as it seems to me rightly, their own franchise—namely, that of comparing their views. I do not doubt they retain the hope that in case their views should prove irreconcilable there may be a place for the good offices of the neutral Powers; but I think it is their opinion that those good offices ought not to be prematurely thrust upon them, but should be left for a future stage. I dare say my hon. Friend would like a further assurance from me; but, in my opinion, it is better on this occasion to say too little rather than too much, and the House, viewing as it does the conduct of the Government in a spirit of confidence, would not desire unduly to press us. I would point out to my hon. Friends that they must not form too high an estimate of the value of the sole and separate opinion of this country. Of the language imputed to Count Bismarck by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) I know nothing, and I cannot but believe he must have been erroneously informed; but do let us bear in mind that England is not Europe, and England is not neutral Europe. With reference to the article published in a paper at Versailles, we have received information that it was expressly disavowed by official authority. I sometimes hear hon. Gentlemen express sentiments to the effect that we have lost our influence in Europe, and that nobody regards us. I think England has no reason to be dissatisfied with the position she occupies in regard to European affairs. The anxiety of other Powers to enter into the consideration of our views, to obtain an expression of them, and to obtain our co-operation—if this were a matter of national vanity, is as much as we ought to desire; and we must be careful we do not strain the opportunities of our position. We cannot assume at all times that all neutral Powers shall be ready to enter into our views; and I would have my hon. Friend bear in mind that when he speaks of the neutral Powers the secret of their strength is not that a portion of them shall enter into a separate combination, broken it may be by the absence of some vital member of the European community, but that the whole shall be prepared to act together. Much must depend on the disposition of the neutral Powers; much must also depend on the disposition of the belligerents. But it is not for me to invent new phrases expressive of the anxiety of the Government on this subject, because already we have advised Her Majesty on two separate occasions in the highest and most authentic form—namely, in the Speech from the Throne—to express the sentiments she entertains, first of all with regard to the duties she has to perform during the course of this afflicting war; and, secondly, in regard to its termination. I am not sure how far I am to understand my right hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman), in his able speech, as objecting to an expression which fell from me on a former night, when I said we should be watchful for opportunities of this kind. I am aware how easy it is to misjudge the precise force of terms that should be used in circumstances so critical; but I do not think that I overstepped the mark. Watchful I think we ought to be and should continue to be; and it would be a great and noble distinction for this country if, without allowing her sense of humanity to betray her into proceeding beyond her right, she could inscribe on the roll of her great deeds having been able to make some contribution, should the need arise, towards the mitigation of conditions, necessarily heavy and severe, which must be imposed on the termination of the war on one of the noblest countries of Europe; so as to afford the hope, expressed in Her Majesty's Speech, that the peace about to be made should not contain within itself the seeds of future trouble and disorder, being so actuated by the principles of justice with reference to the circumstances of the case as to give the assurance that after so great

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, that after the debate that had taken place, and especially having regard to the hearty manner in which his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had spoken on the subject, and also because he had told them that at the present moment, according to the best information in the hands of the Government, neither of the two parties had yet announced their desire for the intervention of this country, he begged, with the permission of the House, to withdraw his Motion.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HENRY LENNOX rose to draw the attention of the House to the condition in which the administration of Naval affairs, both in and out of Parliament, was now placed; and to ask for explanations from the First Lord of the Treasury. He hoped that it was unnecessary for him to offer any apology for introducing this subject, nor could it be necessary for him to state that, in the course he felt it to be his duty to pursue; he was actuated by no hostility to the absent First Lord. No one could feel deeper sympathy than he did for the right hon. Gentleman under the accumulation of misfortunes that had befallen him. The great calamity of last autumn—the loss of the ship in which he had taken such interest, and with it the loss of his son—was sufficient to secure the sympathy not only of his private friends, but of his poetical opponents. But such feelings must give way in time of great national crises; and it was the opinion of himself and of those who acted with him that the time had come when the attention of the Government should be drawn to the state of our naval administration, and when it was felt to be impossible to accept as an excuse the absence of the First Lord, however unavoidable. Another circumstance which induced him to invite explanations from the Secretary to the Admiralty or the First Lord of the Treasury was, that on the first night of the Session, while the state of the Army was fully entered into—indeed, a prominent paragraph on the subject was inserted in the Queen's Speech—the condition of the Navy was passed over with only a slight reference—the right hon. Gentleman merely said that the power of our Navy was generally admitted. Now, he (Lord Henry Lennox) was not the person to deny that we now possessed a powerful iron-clad Navy; but he could not help fearing, from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that he thought that what we had already done in the shape of building iron-clads was sufficient, and that there were no naval problems awaiting solution. He thought the Army Reserves had obtained undue prominence in the councils of the Government. No man could recognize more fully than he did the importance to England of having an efficient Army of Reserve; but, after all, the Army was only the inner line of defence, and that the outer line of defence of the country must always be the Navy. The importance of this had been proved on many occasions. It was sufficient to look back to last autumn, and to the feeling of satisfaction which pervaded the country, when they were assured by the First Lord that we were in possession of good and powerful ships, to be assured that England's main arm of defence must be on the water, and not on the land. It was the right policy of this country to be strong, not only in iron-clad sea-going vessels, but also to have an abundant number of those ships, which were specially suitable for the defence of the coast; for if it was known that we were in a position that rendered invasion an impossibility, England could make her voice heard in the councils of nations with effect, and we should be free from those sudden and unseemly panics which were too characteristic of this country. Then came the question of details, what class of ships would be most effectual for this purpose, their number, and where they should be placed so as best to defend the great centres of our wealth and commerce. But, in the present state of the Admiralty, to whom were they to apply for a solution of these vitally important questions? He would not for a moment be supposed to depreciate the business ability or aptitude of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). Circumstanced as he had himself been, he did not suppose there would be much difficulty in the Secretary for the Admiralty moving the Navy Estimates. It was not the hon. Member for Montrose, it was the system now in effect at the Admiralty that he impugned. Since the present First Lord had been in Office the Secretary to the Admiralty had, in point of fact, discharged few or none of the duties formerly attached to the Office; his functions had been little more than those discharged by the Financial Lord in old times. The Secretary to the Admiralty, under the present First Lord, had not been in any way associated with the naval policy of the Government, or its shipbuilding policy; the present Secretary was no more responsible for such matters than Sir Sydney Dacres was responsible for the stores. Indeed, it seemed to him that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) was simply in the position of head of the purchase department. When this subject was about to be referred to last night in "another place" by a noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), Lord Halifax requested that the discussion should be postponed, because neither he nor Lord Camperdown was prepared with the necessary information. Now, the constitution of the old Board of Admiralty, as he had repeatedly said, was not perfect in various respects; but it had at least this great merit—that the proper prosecution of the business of the Department did not depend upon the health or energy of any one man; while the new system had that radical defect. The present First Lord had always said, in the most explicit manner, that the whole undivided responsibility rested with him—that he was solely responsible to the country, and all his colleagues and subordinate officials to him. So long as the right hon. Gentleman retained his health and energy, and so long as he was willing to bear the entire responsibility of the failures as well as the successes of the Department, the system worked well enough; but the moment that his health failed, or that he began to shirk his responsibility on to the shoulders of other men, the whole machinery he put in motion necessarily ceased to work. He defied anyone to say that that was not a correct description of the Board of Admiralty as it now existed. But further, he said deliberately that there existed now, and that there had existed for some time past, the greatest dissatisfaction in the naval profession at the way in which affairs were carried on. That dissatisfaction arose from many causes, but, chiefly, because they felt that all their professional and private interests were handed over to the despotic will of one man, and that man a civilian. Naval officers might accept much that was unpalatable if they knew that it was advised as beneficial for the service by distinguished and competent members of their own profession; but they knew that in the present administration of affairs by the Board of Admiralty the naval element was, if not altogether annihilated, yet almost completely absorbed. That was a great misfortune, respecting which he hoped to be able to question the First Lord as soon as he returned to his seat; and in case he should not return—and even while the point was doubtful—he would appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he could not manage in some way to have in that House some competent naval authority, who should be able to explain and to defend the naval policy of the Government—such as it was. At present naval officers felt that they were only represented at the Board by an admiral, who might perhaps grumble out a mild protest, but who, remembering that discretion was the better part of valour, oftener remained silent. It might, perhaps, be said that the absence of the First Lord was not unprecedented, and that, as a Member of the late Administration, it was ungracious in him (Lord Henry Lennox) to bring forward a complaint on the subject, seeing that the Conservative First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) was absent during part of the last Session in which his Government held Office. But he could not imagine two cases more entirely distinct, both in respect of time and of attendant circumstances. In 1868 his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone was in his place at the opening of the Session. He was then absent for a period; but at the end of April he had returned, and he fully explained the naval policy of the Government in a most exhaustive speech of three hours and three-quarters. Moreover, during the time that his right hon. Friend was absent through illness he left on the Treasury Bench no less than four Colleagues competent to defend his policy. Two of these were members of the Board—the hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), who was a very distinguished authority on all naval matters; his gallant and lamented Friend Admiral Seymour; the right hon. Member for Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten); and himself (Lord Henry Lennox), who was then Secretary for the Admiralty. Besides this, the absence of the First Lord in 1868 took place when Europe was in profound peace, and when this House was preparing for the rush of the coming dissolution. The absence of the present First Lord took place under very different circumstances. He was absent now, when the House was asked by the Government to adopt very large Estimates in order to provide for a large amount of Army Reserve; and that was itself evidence of the critical state of Europe. Therefore, to compare the absence of his right hon. Friend at the end of a Session with the absence of the present Lord was to compare two things which were totally dissimilar. Let him point to another thing. At the time the right hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) was First Lord he left ample plans and Estimates at Whitehall. He also left Sir Alexander Milne, to whom such a marked tribute was paid in the House last night. He had also left Sir Sydney Dacres, who for 12 or 14 years back was Secretary of the Admiralty, and knew the thoughts and opinions of the First Lord. There were also Sir Spencer Robinson, the Chief Controller of the Navy; the Chief Constructor of the Navy (Mr. Reed); and Mr. Ronayne. And at that time the head of the Admiralty and his subordinates acted together in complete harmony. There might be, and there probably were, occasional divergences of opinion; but the divergence never interfered with the carrying out of what was necessary for the country. They had now in the House, as the only representative of the Admiralty, the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who would no doubt give them all the figures connected with that Department with a clearness that could not be exceeded by the First Lord himself. But there was this great objection to any statement which he might have to make—that he would be propounding to the House a policy in the drawing-up of which he had had no hand. He could only give, at second-hand, the shreds and patches of what he had heard it was the intention of the First Lord to do. But there was another objection to any statement which he might have to make

at second-hand—namely, that at this day there was at the Admiralty none of the harmony which made the working of the Department so pleasant when he was in Office in 1868. He thought it could hardly be said that harmony reigned at the Admiralty just now. While on that point he wished to say a few words about the dismissal of the Chief Controller, Sir Spencer Robinson. When the late Government took Office they were told that it would be impossible for them to carry on the business of the Admiralty, the Controller of the Navy being a violent political opponent of theirs; he must, however, do Sir Spencer Robinson the justice to say that during the two years they had been in Office he never knew him to allow his political opinions to interfere with his public duties, and he had invariably worked with them for the benefit of the country. There had, however, been published during the last few days a most remarkable correspondence. When, the other evening, he (Lord Henry Lennox) ventured to say that he considered the dismissal of Sir Spencer Robinson as a step prejudicial to the public service, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who was generally so kind and lenient in his remarks upon him, took him to task and charged him with want of caution. He accepted that rebuke, coming from such a high authority, with his best and gravest thanks; but on reflection he saw nothing in the matter to prevent him from reiterating, in the strongest terms he could, his opinion that the dismissal of Sir Spencer Robinson at the present moment was an injury and prejudice to the public service, and one much to be regretted by those who had the good of the service at heart. However, as a Committee had been appointed in “another place” to inquire into the matter, he would not now enter upon that point, but defer such observations which he had to make in respect to it until that Committee had fairly and fully reported upon it. It was, however, extraordinary that an officer who six months ago had been so highly eulogized by the present Government should be now dismissed under the circumstances disclosed in the correspondence to which he had referred. There was another thing besides harmony which had disappeared from Whitehall, and that was all sense of personal responsibility. Another point which he wished to press upon the attention of the House was the appointment of the Committee presided over by his noble Friend Lord Dufferin on the subject of the Coast Defences. Three years ago the then First Lord came down to the House and asked them to sanction the construction of two ships of a novel character and of great power, two of which, the Devastation and the Thunderer, of 4,000 tons each, were to be built the first year. As the House was not a professional assembly, evidently they could take such ships or any other only upon the responsibility of the First Lord. Now, it was generally understood that when the First Lord made such a proposition he did so entirely on his own responsibility; but he did not undertake that responsibility until he had submitted the drawings received from the Constructor's and Controller's departments, with every detail, to his professional Colleagues and advisers; but in the case of these ships the case was stronger still, for in respect to these the First Lord had also taken the opinion of a scientific committee, by whom the designs had been fairly tried and approved of. Some exceptions were taken to the proposal by some of his political Friends; but, for his own part, he (Lord Henry Lennox) did not make any objection to them, being unwilling to say or do anything which might seem to take away from the First Lord any portion of his responsibility. Those vessels had been for 18 months in course of construction when the operations upon them were stopped. The progress of the Fury, a still larger vessel, of the same class, was also stopped, while the drawings, specifications, and designs of those ships, voted by the House on the responsibility of the First Lord, were to be revised by a Committee of 16 Gentlemen. He could not but think that that was a great abrogation of the responsible functions of the First Lord. That was another point which he would have wished to press upon the attention of the House, if there had been sitting on the Treasury Bench anyone who avowed himself the naval organ of the Government. There was another point which struck him forcibly, and it was the last with which he would trouble the House. It was the grievous want of anything like proper and due concord between the two great spending Departments of the country—the War Office and the Admiralty—as to what should be our coast defences and where they should be. The War Office was building certain fortifications on land, and the Admiralty was building gunboats and turret-ships to defend the approaches to our harbours, but neither took counsel together on the subject. It was true the Defence Commission was sitting; but although it had been sitting since 1861, the Chief Controller had never been asked to come forward and give evidence upon the subject. That was a point which he would press upon another occasion; but the chief fact with which they had now to deal was that important fact that they had been for the last six months without any naval administration whatever, and at this time a period of six months might be pregnant with the most colossal events. How long, he would ask, was that interregnum to continue? How long was the chaos and confusion and weakness now patent to all in the councils of the Admiralty to be endured by Parliament and the country? If, when the House met, half the chaos and the weakness visible at the Admiralty had existed at the War Office, there would have been a panic from one end of the country to the other. Yet, in his opinion, such a chaos and such a confusion at the Admiralty were far more likely than at the War Office to compromise the position of England. He wished to awaken the right hon. Gentleman from the dream that because we had a powerful Channel Squadron all naval problems were solved. On that side of the House they might well be proud of the squadron, seeing that the principal part of the iron-clads were provided for in the Estimates of the late Board; while as to the Flying Squadron, one of the glories of the present Board, the first-class frigates composing it also appeared there. Those Estimates were the same which were denounced with so much vigour and eloquence by the present First Lord, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. To these points he had felt it to be his duty to allude in the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and to press Her Majesty's Government for an answer, because he felt that, in the present state of affairs, some steps in connection with these matters ought at once to be taken.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in reply to the speech of my noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox), I will begin with the portion which is most agreeable to myself—I allude to his very kind reference to myself. But let me assure him that I did not in the slightest degree object to his entertaining the opinion that the removal of Sir Spencer Robinson has been an unwise and injurious measure; but I did object to his deviation from usage in conveying that opinion through the medium of a Question which related to a dry matter of fact, and was put for the purpose of eliciting information. But with regard to the immediate subject of discussion, I am extremely sorry that my noble Friend has appealed to me personally to know whether the course he has adopted is a reasonable one or not. Having made that appeal to me, I must say—and I say it without intending any offence—that I cannot but regard it as both unreasonable and unfair. Indeed, I have never known any precedent, or anything like a precedent, for the course my noble Friend has adopted. It is the first instance of the kind that has come under my observation in the course of a long Parliamentary experience, and I hope it will be the last. But with regard to the explanation asked of me, I will give it very briefly. The noble Lord says that there is no one on the Treasury Bench as the avowed naval organ of the Government. Now, my hon. Friend near me (Mr. Baxter) is ready to answer any question which may be put with regard to naval affairs, and when he has proved himself incapable to discharge his duty—which up to the present time he has not done—that will be the time for the noble Lord to exhibit his incapacity to the world. My noble Friend says that we have been six months without any naval administration. Now, that statement I beg to contradict in the most emphatic manner. Until about three weeks ago, when Mr. Childers went away, the administration was no less efficient than it was before; for when a Department has been managed with the skill and ability which my right hon. Friend has exhibited, it is not the momentary absence of its Chief which deranges its proceedings or destroys the character of the Department. Of course, I should not dream of denying that the absence of the First Lord during any portion of the Session of Parliament is a public misfortune and a public inconvenience. No one feels it more than we do; no one laments it so much. But the question that has arisen is this—Early in January the indisposition to which Mr. Childers has been subject from time to time became extremely severe, and it was the desire of my right hon. Friend to resign his Office. He urged upon me more than once the acceptance of his resignation. We, however, believed that his resignation would be a greater public evil and inconvenience than his possible absence from his place during the first two or three weeks of the Session. For that decision I alone am responsible, and by that responsibility I am perfectly willing to abide. I believe, moreover, that no man holding the position I do would have come to any other decision. That decision would, I believe, have been come to in the case of any First Lord; but, in my opinion, and I think also in the opinion of the House, my right hon. Friend has not been an ordinary First Lord. [“Hear!”] It is natural that you should put your own interpretation upon that sentiment. By all means do so. But my right hon. Friend came into Office a little more than two years ago, and in the two Naval Estimates which he prepared he has offered to the country relief to the extent of one and three-quarter millions of taxation, while at the same time it is our contention that he has done so not by weakening, but by strengthening, the condition of our Navy. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE: No, no!] It is nothing new to find the hon. Baronet disagree from me. And now, if I understand him, he boldly denies that the Estimates were reduced. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE: No, no!] Well, I think it fortunate that the hon. Baronet agrees with even one-half of what I say—for the other half I must trust to the judgment of the House. Now, I confess that, during the whole of my Parliamentary experience, I have never before known a discussion upon our naval affairs raised upon the eighth day of the Session. My noble Friend says that he has adopted that course because of the critical times in which we live. But I do not admit that the time is critical with regard to the condition of the Admiralty. I am willing to admit that there are very grave questions—especially with regard to construction—that are not yet satisfactorily solved, and that fact might have absolved Mr. Childers from much of the criticism to which he has been subjected. But there is no question of re-construction with regard to the Fleet or Navy in the slightest degree analogous to the question of the Army; which, with regard to the critical condition of Europe is a pressing consideration. Indeed, I confidently assert that there never has been a time when our country has been so secure in our naval supremacy. But the noble Lord, only eight days after the Session has commenced, has felt himself irresistibly compelled, from the twinges and prickings of conscience, to bring the state of our naval administration under the consideration of Parliament. When my noble Friend himself moved the Estimates, in a manner which I think did him infinite credit, he did so, not on the eighth day of the Session, but on the 14th of March. Well, let us see whether by the 14th of March the First Lord may not be in his place. I quite agree that the absence of my right hon. Friend cannot be indefinitely prolonged. Indeed, I am afraid that the term must be a very short one in which we must judge whether we can press or urge him further—because it will depend upon pressure or urgency from us—to continue in the service of the Queen; but I must confess that it seems to me to be altogether strange and without precedent that such notice should be taken of this circumstance. The noble Lord might have remembered that in the case of his own Government the First Lord was absent from the middle of March to the end of April, and that with that arrangement the noble Lord and his Colleagues were perfectly contented. I do not question my noble Friend's motives. I daresay he has felt the necessity of raising the subject in this unusual manner. But we do not share his alarm, and we think his comparison with the War Office a needless one. We do not admit that the Admiralty is paralyzed. I contend that the current business is proceeding as it ought to proceed. The preparation of the Estimates in every essential particular was completed by my right hon. Friend the First Lord, before he reluctantly felt himself bound to take that course which I may say I almost compelled him by my pressure and remonstrance to adopt. And my noble Friend says that the Navy is now for the first time subjected to the despotic will of one man. I never heard such a doctrine. Does the noble Lord really think that any question ought to be decided by a majority of the Board, and that the First Lord ought to be liable to be out-voted by his own Board? Why, he knows his own First Lord, and every First Lord who is worth a sixpence, has ruled upon his own responsibility; and, therefore, this despotic rule of one man has always been the rule at the Admiralty. Would the noble Lord have a dual government established in every Office and Department in the State—dual government with real effective dualism, so that there shall be two chiefs to a Department always bound to agree in everything, and yet differing on details? The noble Lord has spoken of the Naval Lords as grumbling against the decisions of the tyrannical First Lord. Is that a becoming description for a former Secretary of the Admiralty to give with regard to the two gallant Admirals who are at this moment members of the Board of Admiralty, and who were members of that Board at the time when the noble Lord himself was connected with it?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: There is only one of the Naval Lords who has been on the Board under both the late and the present Administrations. I must also correct a mistake into which the right hon. Gentleman has fallen. I did not say “grumbled at the decisions of the First Lord.” I said they “grumbled out a mild protest.”

MR. GLADSTONE: As there is only one Lord who has served under both Governments, the noble Lord's description must be especially meant for that one. That is the manner in which my noble Friend, in his zeal for the public service, thinks it seemly to describe the public spirit and personal conscience of a gallant Admiral with whom he has himself served. I have taken upon myself the responsibility of inflicting on the House and on the public a considerable public inconvenience, and I have done it for a reason that often obtains in this imperfect world—on the chance, by embracing a lesser evil, of avoiding a greater. The noble Lord will not think it is out of any want of respect for him that I do not now touch on those purely administrative questions which have been raised. No doubt they are fair subjects for discussion, and they will come on in their own time; but, in the meanwhile, I hope I have shown the House that the Government has a true sense of the state of the case; and I hope that before my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty returns and is called upon to take the decision—which must now be taken almost in a few days—that the right hon. Gentleman will be allowed a little interval in order that he may act as best fitted for the public service. There is no likelihood of my right hon. Friend being governed by any other consideration, and no doubt the House will afford him that indulgence, so that he may be ready to state the grounds and reasons of his own conduct when he shall be properly in tune. I only ask for that to which my right hon. Friend is entitled, and which, up to this moment, has never been denied by the House of Commons.

MR. CORRY said, he was the last person in the world to say anything harsh or inconsiderate of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, whose absence from the House and the reason for that absence, he sincerely deplored. He trusted that absence would be continued but for a short time longer; but the non-representation of the Admiralty in the House of Commons had already been the subject of much serious comment, and the matter demanded attention. When the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown complained that there was no precedent for the course taken by his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox), he must remind him that a time when the Admiralty was not represented in the House of Commons was also unprecedented. The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown had told them that the Secretary to the Admiralty was to be found in his place in Parliament to give any information on Admiralty questions; but it should be borne in mind that at the present time the Secretary to the Admiralty was only Secretary in name, and did not now perform those functions which in former times he (Mr. Corry) had discharged himself. He should not have said a word on this point had it not been that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had drawn a parallel between the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty at the present time and the absence which he (Mr. Corry) was compelled to take, from ill health, when he occupied the same post in 1868. He was most grateful to the House for the indulgence which it then showed him; but he felt bound to point out that the two cases were not quite parallel. In the first place, his (Mr. Corry's) supervision over the naval administration never ceased during the whole time he was absent. When he went to Dover, and afterwards abroad, he never ceased to exercise that general supervision over the naval administration which it was necessary to exercise. Every paper of importance was invariably sent to him; and to show that his supervision was not merely formal, he might mention that when on one occasion the Board of Admiralty met to consider the question of the construction of some turret-ships of the Captain class, according to the proposal of the Controller of the Navy, based upon the strong expression of opinion which had been previously given in this House in favour of building ships of that type, he came up from Dover, although very ill at the time, in order to put his veto on the carrying out of such a proposal until the Captain itself should have been tried. And there was a still greater difference between the circumstances of the absence of the present First Lord of the Admiralty and his own absence in 1868—namely, that while he (Mr. Corry) was away the Admiralty was represented in Parliament by the hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), the gallant and lamented Admiral Seymour, and by another member of the Board also; while now, for the first time almost in the history of Admiralty, the Civil Lord was a Member of the other House, and there was not a single member of the Board present in the House of Commons. That showed that there was a very material difference in regard to the representation of the Admiralty in the two cases. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had spoken of the enormous reductions made by the present administration; but he seemed to have forgotten that some £600,000 or £700,000 of those reductions were effected by his predecessors in Office; and besides this, certain substantial results of good administration had been transferred by him (Mr. Corry) to his successor at the Admiralty. It was also the fashion to say that the present Administration had increased the strength and efficiency of the Navy; but the fact still remained that they had reduced the number of men in the Navy by 5,000. As to the number of ships, the late Administration added no less than 10 armour-clad vessels to the Navy, which would really represent an additional power of quite 20 of the vessels which were built before. What had the present Government done in that direction? It was true they had ordered some gigantic freeboard ships; but in consequence of the grave suspicions excited as to the safety of those vessels various modifications had been proposed by the Admiralty themselves, and the whole matter was now before a Committee to be reported upon. The question of the constitution of the Board of Admiralty was a most serious one, and he should be sorry to enter into it in the absence of the First Lord; but all he could say was that unless the principle on which it was constituted was reformed and revised some serious calamity might be brought about.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he thought the House and the country were greatly indebted to his noble Friend the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), for the very able way in which he had brought forward that subject, and also for doing it at the right moment. The Prime Minister had made a most remarkable statement, accusing his noble Friend of introducing an unreasonable and inappropriate discussion. He could only infer from that that the right hon. Gentleman was entirely ignorant of what was going on in the country and of what was the public feeling. Had he not heard that during the Recess the state of our armaments was a great cause of anxiety to the country generally, and did he suppose that that anxiety applied only to the military departments? Why, if he did he was under a complete misapprehension. Quite as much uneasiness existed about the state of our naval defences as about that of our military defences, and, he might add, with much greater reason. The right hon. Gentleman must have been living in some Elysium of his own if he did not know what had been the constant and general subject of conversation and discussion during the last few months in every part of the kingdom. It was, he thought, not only the right but the bounden duty of his noble Friend, as a former Secretary of the Admiralty, to call attention to that question. The prevailing impression among the public was that our naval defences were at present inadequate to the requirements of the country. One of the first changes now required, both by the public feeling and by the real necessities of the country, was a complete revision of our naval system. He did not think that the remark of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government—that his noble Friend ought not to have brought forward this subject in the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty—was quite justified. He was sure nobody more sincerely regretted the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty than his noble Friend did; but there were national emergencies that overrode all personal considerations; and, if ever there was a moment when it was incumbent on the House of Commons to go into the question of our naval defences, it was the present one. He had been mixed up for many years with the discussions of the Board of Admiralty; and much as he himself had always felt the necessity of a complete revision of the system of the Board of Admiralty, he was never more thoroughly convinced of it than he was now; because, whatever was wrong with it formerly, the former faults seemed now to be aggravated to a ten-fold degree. As he had said before, he regretted the enforced absence of the First Lord; but there were subjects which must override all personal considerations. The civilian element in the Board had been too strong before, and if there was too little responsibility before there was less now; and now it was notorious that the present First Lord had entirely ignored the naval element of the Board, and had announced himself to be solely responsible for all its proceedings. A state of things more dangerous or more anomalous than that inaugurated by the present First Lord of the Admiralty could not well be conceived. Such was the extent of the interference by the First Lord and the civilian members of the Board that officers who had held high commands had, at the termination of those commands, refused to fill still higher positions because they felt they would be so hampered and tormented by the interference of the civilians in the present Board that they would not undertake to serve under it. Only last autumn two distinguished admirals in succession refused the offer of the command of the Channel Squadron. It was perfectly well known why that offer was declined. Distinguished men in the naval service would not subject themselves to the kind of inquisitorial proceedings instituted in the Board of Admiralty, and, in fact, the command of the Channel Squadron went begging. Never was it more desirable than now to have an efficient and harmonious Board of Admiralty, and nothing was more likely to create what was called a panic in the country than a knowledge of what was the present position of that Board. As his noble Friend had truly said, one of the first essentials at the Board was harmony among its members. From what they had seen of the very remarkable correspondence published the other day between the Prime Minister and the Controller of the Navy not only was there not harmony at the present Board, but it would appear as if a distinguished admiral had been treated with some harshness. In conclusion, he hoped they would have the earliest possible opportunity of entering into the whole question of whether or not they now had a Board of Admiralty fitted to be entrusted with its functions.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was sorry that the earlier part of the evening had been so long occupied with another debate that a matter of so much importance as the present one had been delayed till an hour when hon. Members naturally began to be impatient. No question raised since the delivery of the Queen's Speech more deserved the grave consideration of the House than that introduced by his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox). It was an extraordinary thing for the Prime Minister to be obliged to get up and answer for the Admiralty, that Board having no other representative in that House but the Storekeeper of the Navy. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said that our fleet was in a proper condition; but Her Majesty's Speech recommended them to gather lessons in regard to their armaments from the experience of the last few months. What was the light of that experience? The recent reports of the French admirals were fruitful in such lessons. The French admirals proceeded to the Baltic with a fleet of heavy draught, analogous to our own Channel Fleet, and they reported to their Government that they could do nothing. They had 20,000 troops on board, which they might have landed on their enemy's coast if they had used small vessels. The moment the Prussians saw the French fleet they snapped their fingers at it, and General Von Falckenstein was enabled to take part in the campaign with 150,000 men; whereas if the French had employed gunboats they might have ravaged the whole length of their enemy's coast from Pomerania to the Elbe, and detained so vast a portion of the Prussian force there that the war would never have gone beyond Sedan. England had to guard some seven or eight great focuses of its trade, and to employ many vessels of war in protecting its commerce. At the present moment England had not a sufficient number of ships to guard her commerce; and if she went to war with any country that had a shelving shore, it would be impossible to land munitions of war upon her shores on account of the large tonnage of our ships of war. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) recently assured his constituents, on the authority of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), that the fleet was quite sufficient for the requirements of the country during many years to come; but what were the facts? Simply, that in the whole Navy there were no two ships exactly alike. No two vessels were of the same speed, there were not two topsail yards of the same length, and when a ship went into harbour to refit, the whole of the masts, spars, &c., had to be made specially to suit its peculiar build. Vessels were sailed not according to their speed, but according to the rank of their commanders; the consequence being that very frequently different ships belonging to the same fleet were under great risk of running into each other. He felt that in discussing these questions he was much embarrassed by the calamity they all deplored. In the face of the dreadful bereavement which had fallen upon the First Lord of the Admiralty, through the loss of the Captain, and of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman was absent from the House by reason of illness, he could not speak with the same freedom he should otherwise have exercised. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would soon be back in renewed health; but he must ask what the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would do in case the First Lord of the Admiralty was unable to resume duty? Would he bring back the octogenarian Peer who had lately been keeping warm the eggs of the Admiralty? Why, the right hon. Gentleman had not in his whole phalanx a gentleman fit to be First Lord of the Admiralty. [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman laughed—but let him show the man. The other day 2,500 tons of food had to be sent to Paris for the support of the inhabitants; and it was stated by a representative of the Government that the getting this amount of stores on board the transports in from 15 to 20 hours was a feat of the greatest possible dexterity, showing the enormous resources of the Navy. Yet this amount of food was just 17 days' provisions for the men and boys voted for the Navy. Why, he remembered that in 1842 two line-of-battle ships, in Portsmouth and Plymouth respectively, were completely rigged and loaded in 24 hours. Although they would have another opportunity of discussing the dismissal of Sir Spencer Robinson, he wished now to say that, as the affair struck him, it seemed that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had made a scapegoat of that gallant officer; but Sir Spencer was one of those goats who would not be driven just as the First Lord of the Treasury desired. He had no love for Sir Spencer Robinson, for he had done more harm to his (Sir James Elphinstone's) constituents than any man who ever breathed; but he never saw a man down without picking him up if he thought the man had been wronged, and he thought Sir Spencer Robinson had been ill-used. There would, however, be other opportunities for discussing that particular question. This country was just now in the extraordinary position of not being able to take the sea for offensive operations, because the Navy had no small vessels for the protection of the coast, and we never should be able to do so unless we had 100 smaller vessels for the purposes of cruising, of defending our harbours, and protecting our commerce. So far as the Administration was concerned, they found the extraordinary spectacle of men possessing the highest administrative ability on naval questions answered in Parliament by boys utterly ignorant of the questions with which they were called upon to deal. He had been utterly astounded by finding that in "another place," on the preceding night, a mere youth, possessing no knowledge of naval questions, was put up to answer one of the most consummate naval administrators in the House of Lords. And then they found the First Lord of the Treasury throwing his ægis over an effete Department, where the utmost confusion prevailed along with the greatest animosity among its members, and adopting the hackneyed plan of dirtying his opponent's attorney.

MR. BAXTER desired to say only a few words. He did not, in the least, complain of any remark made by the noble Lord who introduced this discussion (Lord Henry Lennox), and who had a perfect right to interrogate the First Lord of the Treasury as to the time at which the First Lord of the Admiralty was likely to return to his duties—because it was, without doubt, a matter of very serious inconvenience to the public service for so important an official to be absent when the Estimates belonging to his Department were about to be introduced. As his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury had stated, the First Lord of the Admiralty was expected back at his post in a few days, and it would then be for the Government to decide as to the future. It would depend upon the decision of the First Lord himself whether he would continue at the head of his Department or retire. He strongly deprecated any discussion just now of the Estimates, which were not yet even in the hands of Members; though several hon. Gentlemen had criticized them without having seen them. He hoped they would be in the possession of hon. Members by Monday next, and that in a week or two his right hon. Friend would be in his place to explain them, and also to state the general policy of the Government on naval matters. During the 16 years he (Mr. Baxter) had been a Member of that House he never remembered a discussion in the first week of a Session similar to that which had just been held, and he must again protest against such discussion not only as unusual, but most inoppor-tune. He would never say one word to lead the people of England to believe that the Administration of the right hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), or any other naval Administration, had not properly provided for the defences of the country. He might have thought some former Administrations had not managed the Department as well as might have been expected; but he could never have looked with favour upon the spectacle of Gentlemen going about the country and saying—as had been freely said of the present Admiralty administration—that the Admiralty, when in charge of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), and of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), was inefficient for the performance of the duties devolving upon it. He could assure the House that the Admiralty was, at the present moment, fully competent to satisfy all the demands likely to be made upon it. Further, he would tell the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) that he had mistaken his (Mr. Baxter's) position when he compared it to that of a Storekeeper in the Navy. He was responsible for the buying and selling of all naval stores; but that was only a small portion of his duty. He deemed himself responsible to the First Lord for the naval administration of the country, and he was prepared, at the proper time, to answer any questions that might be put to him on that subject. He hoped the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth would regret the remarks he had just made with reference to what occurred in the House of Lords last night. He was sure there was no man who had attended more laboriously to his duty as a Lord of the Admiralty than his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown). He thought his noble Friend answered all the questions put to him in a manner entirely satisfactory. He hoped the House would wait with patience till the Naval Estimates were introduced before they entered upon a discussion of this subject. As the Government had already told the House, in a few days they expected the First Lord of the Admiralty to be in his place, and, until then, he hoped the House would suspend its judgment on matters concerning the management of the Navy.

WEST AFRICAN SETTLEMENTS BILL.

(NO. 1.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to extend the jurisdiction of the Courts of the West African Settlements to certain offences committed out of Her Majesty's dominions. At present the inhabitants of the districts adjoining our settlements of Sierra Leone, Gambia, the Gold Coast, and Lagos, were not under the jurisdiction of any civilized Government; yet as crimes were frequently perpetrated in those barbarous territories against British subjects and persons residing in our settlements, and there were no means of making the offenders amenable to law, it was desirable to provide for the trial and punishment of such crimes and outrages. The Bill therefore extended the jurisdiction of our Courts to 20 miles beyond the boundaries of our settlements; and authorized the apprehension of any offender within our settlements who may have committed a criminal act in the limits outside.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of Whole House To-morrow.

(NO. 7.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that he desired to lay before their Lordships his object in proposing this legislation. The object of the Bill was one of great simplicity, and its machinery was very analogous to that which their Lordships had sanctioned in another case for a similar purpose. That object was to allow clergymen who, either from age, or pressing bodily infirmity, were incapacitated from the due discharge of their duties, to resign any benefice they might hold, retiring on a moderate pension, chargeable on the revenues of the benefice with the consent of all the parties concerned. In asking their Lordships to do this, he was only asking them to restore the law of England to what it used to be. It seemed to him to be one of those Conservative and safe amendments of the law which he should have thought would have been most acceptable to their Lordships, and he regretted that some noble Lords, Friends of his, for whose opinions he had the highest respect, differed from him as to the expediency of it. He could not tell what these objections would be until he heard them; but he would give them the most careful consideration when he knew what they were. He was simply seeking a restoration of the law to what it was previous to 31 Elizabeth, c. 6, s. 8, which made pensions on the resignation of benefices unlawful. That statute was a wise measure at the time, for the granting of pensions was a part of a great system of abuse which had prevailed. It was aimed against an usurped jurisdiction of the Papacy, under which these pensions were granted without the slightest regard to the interests of the parishes, and for the mere purpose of heaping a multitude of simultaneous pensions on some one resigning clerk. This was a gross abuse, and it was necessary at the time to cut deep in order to cut away the roots of the abuse. But under this Bill no such abuse could arise, for it provided that no retiring clerk should be able under any circumstances to receive more than one pension at the same time. Reference to the Reformatio Legum would give ample evidence of what was designed; and, indeed, this measure, down to some of its very minutest details, was one of the wise and moderate recommendations contained in the Reformatio Legum, and had some operation for a time, though it had never been incorporated, as it was intended to be, in the statute book. He (the Bishop of Winchester) sought to restore the law, with certain abatements, to what it had been before the statute of Elizabeth. He might well seek to do this, because he thought it was an act of charity and justice to the parochial clergy. He believed there was no body of men discharging important official duties, which required so much health and strength, who did so without any prospect of retiring, when stricken with years, on some pension out of the funds of the profession they had adopted. This was the more hard as it was impossible for the greater portion of them to make any decent provision by the savings of their profession during their years of active health. He thought their Lordships would hardly wish the body of their clergy to be driven either to give up altogether the position which they held, or to continue to attempt to render services which the clergy themselves, more painfully than any others, knew they could no longer render with due efficiency; and the more sacred their duties the more cruel it was to inflict upon their consciences the terrible alternative of doing wrong to their own conscience or exposing their families to that which was close upon starvation. The man who had given the prime of his life, the best of his years, and the flower of his intellect to the grave duties of the parochial priesthood, was surely entitled, when he was no longer able to discharge those duties, from age or sickness, to look for such a moderate provision in his age as he had earned for himself by hard service when enabled by Providence to render it. And this was the more due to these gentlemen—for gentlemen they were while serving as the parochial clergy—because the Legislature had already extended a similar provision to the order of Bishops of the national Church, which he felt had no right to those advantages while they were withheld from those who perhaps had not during their service an equal share in the good things of this world. It was right and just that this provision should be made for the parochial clergy of England; but he made the appeal further because it was for the interests of the parishes themselves, which this clergy served, that the change should be made. He could assure their Lordships that in some cases the parish did suffer most severely from the causes to which he had referred. The clergyman was often, in addition to his spiritual office, the centre of literary life and of moral power in a parish; and when he was disabled, and when there was no resident nobleman or gentleman, or earnest-minded Dissenting minister, the relaxation of the power of that central spring caused the inhabitants to sink down to a dead level of stagnation. It was manifest that such parishes suffered under grievous injustice. The injury inflicted on the parishes by the absence of any provision for retirement extended beyond the particular parishes concerned; for the present system helped to maintain the most vicious idea which had spread so widely that these benefices were for the use of those who were paid by them, and not so much for the benefit of the people to whom they ministered. It was desirable that the fallacy should be removed, because anything was valuable that tended to remove the idea that because our forefathers had wisely endowed the ministers of the Church with freehold property, they had not had in view especially the spiritual benefit of the population of the several parishes. These freeholds were in the nature of a trust, and when the trust was violated, the freeholders had no longer the right to retain them. The interests of the parish formed the first consideration, and these could be obtained by the appointment of a younger and stronger man. It had been said that the object would be obtained by suffering the Bishop to appoint a curate, and to pay the curate out of the income of the benefice. But that was not the same thing; it was a wholly different thing to have an efficient clergyman as the incumbent of a parish and a worn-out clergyman as the incumbent backed by a curate. In the first place, there was a feeling of security in a man's mind when he held the position of incumbent. While he was incumbent he was not liable to be removed, unless he himself chose, and therefore he gave his whole heart and soul to his work in a way which no man could do who might be removed in a few months. There was a taking root in the one case, and a mere putting in a rootless branch in the other. And besides this there must necessarily be, while human nature was what it was, some feeling between the older incumbent and the younger curate; there must spring up just that feeling of jealousy and alienation which created more harm in a parish than any feeling of a secular character whatever. The former having had his power enfeebled by degrees would not feel the amount of change that had become necessary, and would see with distaste what he would think the unnecessary activity of the curate whom the Bishop had forced upon him. Therefore, there would not be the benefit to the parish if you gave to the Bishop power to appoint a curate that there would be if you gave the rector the power of retiring. It was one thing to enable an incumbent—for no compulsion was to be put upon him—to enjoy repose, perhaps in a place where his family were settled, and where a decent allowance would enable him to sustain a less expensive position; it was another thing to compel him to be the witness of an activity which he secretly disliked. He did not know what the objections which were to be brought against the Bill would be. He knew it was said last year that the proposal contained in the Bill would be beneficial in the case of large benefices, but that it would fail in the case of small benefices. Now, he could not see why a measure by which some benefices would profit should be objected to because it would be inoperative in others. The whole subject had been most carefully studied by the clergy in the Lower House of Convocation—and they knew pretty well what was most for their own interest and welfare, and that body were unanimous in desiring that this measure should be carried. It was part of a great reform which they hoped to carry into another part of the Church machinery—the Queen Anne's Bounty. They hoped that the readjustment of Queen Anne's Bounty, which had been favourably received by the whole Bench of Bishops, and which he believed was also favourably received by the great bulk of the parochial clergy, would in a great degree meet the difficulty and objection to which he had just referred. A most careful statement had been drawn up of what was now yielded by Queen Anne's Bounty, and what would be yielded by the Bounty if the measure now proposed was carried into effect. His right rev. Brethren—and he believed the bulk of the parochial clergy, were anxious to provide out of that fund assistance for the small benefices. The measure did not propose to alter the amount paid by the Bishops for this reason—that they paid more now than the Lower House of Convocation. That House had now proposed an alteration of the law which would throw a large increase of payment to Queen Anne's Bounty on their own body, and diminish the sum paid under the recent Act of Parliament by the Episcopal Order. But the Bishops, though paying more than the clergy, did not desire to see any reduction of their quota to Queen Anne's Bounty, their proposal being that there should be raised a very moderate tax of 1 per cent upon all benefices the income of which exceeded the sum on which the income tax was not paid. This tax of 1 per cent would go to the clergy instead of the First Fruits—a burden which was very onerous, being imposed on taking possession, and which was at the same time uncertain, unjust, and inadequate, large upon some, and nothing at all upon the great mass of the benefices of the country. The result of the alteration of this payment in the diocese of Lichfield, as his right rev. Brother had with great activity ascertained, would be this—Lichfield at present paid £150 a year to Queen Anne's Bounty; but if the alteration proposed was carried out there would be £1,500 a year from the diocese of Lichfield. It was proposed that that £150, which was now paid in augmentation of livings through Queen Anne's Bounty, should be retained, and £550 added to it; and there would still remain for the diocese £800 a year to be paid for pensions to poor clergymen retiring from livings under £300 a year. He apprehended that this would be one of the greatest practical benefits that could be bestowed upon them. The only other objection which he could conceive of was that the measure would give rise to jobs. But in the drawing-up of the Bill very great care had been taken to provide against any abuse of the principle of the Bill. It had been objected that the interests of the patrons were not sufficiently consulted by the Bill, with a view to the prevention of jobs, and a suggestion had been made that the Bill might be altered in Committee so that the consent of the patron of the living should be required; and that in the event of any difference of opinion between the patron of the living and the Bishop of the diocese, an appeal should be made, as in many other cases, to the Archbishop of the province, whose judgment should be final on the matter. Now, if that would remove the difficulty, he would be perfectly ready in Committee to agree to that change; and he believed he might say on behalf of his right rev. Brethren beside him that they would be equally as ready as himself to consent to it. Another objection which had been mentioned to him was as to the age at which a clergyman should retire and the pension become due should be defined. To this he had no objection on principle. The age of 70 years had been proposed; but he could not agree to that. It would be hard on the body of the clergy to tell them that they could not get this pension until they were 70 years old. He had proposed the age of 60 years, as he thought that a man who had been working from 23 to 60 years of age should have an opportunity of retiring upon a third of his income if he desired it, if he felt age creeping upon him, and if his Bishop agreed to it. He did not know what other objection could be made to the Bill; but he would endeavour to weigh any that was stated to the utmost of his power. He would leave the Bill in their Lordships' hands, earnestly entreating for the sake of the credit of the national Church, for the sake of the clergy, and, more than all, for the sake of the parishioners, for whose benefit these endowments had been given by our forefathers, that they would permit a second reading of the Bill, and sanction the most important principle it contained.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."

LORD ROMILLY said, he rose, with considerable reluctance, to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He had no doubt that the right rev. Prelate, in bringing forward that measure, was actuated by a sincere desire to benefit the Church. It was from exactly the same motive, because he (Lord Romilly) sincerely believed that this Bill would be very injurious to the Church, that he had ventured to put his judgment in opposition to that of the right rev. Prelate. In a matter of this description, which was not a matter of doctrine nor a matter of discipline, but which was merely a matter of finance, it was quite clear that a lay member of the Church might be as competent to form an opinion as the Episcopal Bench. The present was one of three Bills which were before the House at the end of the last Session, two of which were passed in a very hurried manner. Not only was he sincerely attached to the Church of England from early education and from subsequent reflection, but he believed that attachment to it was deeply rooted in the hearts of the great body of the English people. Indeed, he believed that were a religious Census taken its members would be found far to exceed all the Dissenters put together. The two great causes of its popularity were the independence of the parochial clergy and the lay element. But he proposed to show that the Bill would seriously affect the independence of the parochial clergy, and also seriously affect the right of the lay patrons. It was necessary to observe that there were two classes of persons among the parochial clergy who would be affected by this Bill. One class consisted of those clergy who had lived a long time in the parish, and, having become old, were unwilling to retire, unless compelled; but there was another class who, from various causes, desired to retire at once. Let their Lordships consider the case of a clergyman who had held the incumbency of a parish 30, 40, or 50 years, had been expecting to spend his last days there, who had, probably, christened more than half the population—let their Lordships consider the cruelty of compelling such a clergyman to leave the scene of his life-long labours to live upon a reduced income, in a place where he was unknown, and which had no associations for him. It might be said that as no commission could be issued without the clergyman's written application to the Bishop, he would not retire unless he himself desired to do so; but what moral pressure would be put upon him! One good-natured friend would tell him that the Bishop thought him incompetent to perform the duties of his office; another would tell him that, though he preached occasionally and administered the sacraments, had a very good curate, and had a wife highly useful in the parish, still at his age he ought to resign. He would find it impossible to resist the pressure; and if clergymen in such cases declined to resign, compulsory powers would, probably, be next asked for. The case with which it was most necessary to deal—alienation of mind—was not touched by the Bill, for such a clergyman could not apply for a commission. It would be very hard to remove from a parish an aged incumbent, for whom all the inhabitants had come to entertain a filial affection, and who would be gravely injured by the Act; and, in spite of the opinion of the Lower House of Convocation, he believed that the clergy generally would regard this measure as the infliction of a calamitous protection for them. He attributed little weight to the opinion of Convocation in this matter, for it was notorious that the parochial clergy were not really represented in Convocation any more than they were in that House. There was another class of persons—men who, perhaps, had had an accession of property, or for other reasons, would be glad to retire, profess their inability further to continue in the performance of the duties of the parish, and in that case they would carry off one-third of the income from the parish, and retire from the Church. As to the commissioners preventing jobs, how could that be done? If a young man professed to be incapacitated by illness, how could it be ascertained that he was not so? He might get a medical certificate of certain ailments, and might probably possess some ailments, though not sufficient to disable him. The Bill would enable him to leave the living with a diminished income; whereas he would otherwise have resigned, and left it without any burden. There was also another serious objection to the Bill—the expense of working it. The commissioners who were to take evidence under it must be paid. The commissioners were to take evidence and examine persons, and if they thought the incumbent ought not to retire, the expense of the inquiry would be a charge upon him; while in the other event half of it was to be paid out of the living. The expense would make the machinery quite inapplicable to small livings; indeed, this was admitted by the right rev. Prelate. He desired also to call attention to the novelty of the proposal. Bishops had hitherto been restricted to questions of doctrine and discipline; but this was one of a series of Bills which gave them a voice in the financial arrangements of the parochial clergy. This he regarded as a very serious evil. He could see no calamity to a parish in having the duties amply performed by a curate, under the direction of an incumbent who had had a long experience of the parish, and was well acquainted with its requirements. The patron, to whom and to the incumbent all financial affairs ought, he contended, to be left, was wholly ignored by the Bill. His one representative on the commission would be outvoted by the four other members, or might even be displaced by the Bishop, who was to be able to remove any commissioner he deemed unfit and to appoint a substitute. The Bishop was also to fix the amount of the pension, provided it did not exceed one-third of the income of the benefice; and as the Bill stood, he saw nothing to prevent a succession of retirements and pensions. The result of this would be that the patron would be dissatisfied with his position, and would dispose of his advowson. Lay patronage was a very beneficial element in the Church, and he deprecated anything which would weaken it. He objected to this and its companion measures as likely to further the efforts of those persons who wished to remove the Episcopal Bench from their Lordships' House, and to overthrow the Established Church, and as likely also to alienate the best friends of the Church.

An Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Romilly.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that as to the objection of the great danger of clergymen being forcibly brought within the operation of the Bill, the answer was simple—he would remind the noble and learned Lord (Lord Romilly) that the Bill did not come into operation until the clergyman had requested the Bishop to appoint a commission, and the incumbent could avoid all the evils and dangers which he saw in it by simply taking no advantage of its provisions. He thought the noble and learned Lord, in the early part of his speech, led the House too much into the region of sentiment. Why should a clergyman differ from every other person who served the public, or a private individual, as to the necessity of giving up attempting to discharge his duties when he had no longer the power to do so? There was a class of very estimable men—most valuable servants of the public, whom of all others Parliament would be most sorry to oppress—but who were now subject to this same dangerous permission. He believed it was open to a Judge, if he wished to retire, to apply in the proper quarter, and obtain a portion of his salary as a pension; and he had never heard this described as a hardship, or heard of the danger of a Judge being bullied and worried by ill-judging friends into unnecessary resignation. A Judge was just as likely to have a sentimental attachment for the Bench on which he had sat half his life as a clergyman for his living; and if there was a danger of being bullied protection ought to be applied as much to the Judge as to the clergyman. The same might be said of every part of the public service. No reform had been more beneficial or more general in modern times than the principle of superannuation of public servants, and the Bill simply proposed its application to the parochial clergy. If some such measure were not passed, surely the clergy would have a right to complain that a liberty which had already been given to the Bishops was not given to them. He desired also to say that he thought the rights of patrons were not protected as they ought to be; but this was a matter for future consideration. While not regarding the Bill as perfect, and thinking the rights of patrons were not sufficiently protected, its general principle was wise and necessary, and an indispensable sequel to the reform applied by Parliament to both the civil and ecclesiastical service.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY supported the Bill, which he thought would be beneficial; but he feared that its application would be limited to the richer livings. The rights of the parishioners ought to be protected; and, therefore, the churchwarden of the parish ought to be one of the commissioners in place of the magistrate nominated by the Bishop.

LORD CAIRNS said, that last year he had made several objections to the Bill then before them, and some of them still existed. The two principal points of objection had, however, been remedied, and his objections might be modified or removed by the Amendments to which the right rev. Prelate was willing to agree. One of these concerned the rights of the patron—that no resignation should take place without his having a potent voice in the matter. Another, to the terms upon which an incumbent should be permitted to resign. The Bill contained no definition of the period of life that would entitle an incumbent to retire—it did not often happen that a clergyman held a benefice from the age of 23 to 60, for he seldom got a living at the former age. He agreed that an incumbent, incapacitated by illness, should be able to retire irrespectively of age; but he objected to fixing 60 as the age entitling a clergyman to a pension, for a man of 60 might, ex hypothesi, be healthy and vigorous, and quite competent to discharge his duties. This and one or two other points might be considered in Committee, and he now only threw it out for consideration. There were also other matters that would have to be considered; and one was a subject of great importance. The existing law subjected to the penalties of simony the making of any resignation of a benefice in consideration of a money payment; and in the present Bill the right rev. Prelate proposed to enact that the transactions under this Bill should not be subjected to the penalties against simony. Now, unless this provision were very carefully guarded, they would open a door to a most corrupt kind of jobbery in the traffic in livings. Nothing would be so easy as to enter into a private arrangement in reference to the next presentation with the incumbent, that in addition to having one-third of his income under this Bill, the purchaser should secretly give him something more, in order to induce him to retire. This ought to be carefully guarded against. Another objection was this—What was to be the position for the future of the incumbent who retired upon one-third of his income? Suppose, for instance, that an incumbent availing himself of the Act passed last Session chose to make the necessary declaration and to retire from orders altogether. He would then receive one-third of the income arising out of the benefice of a Church from which he had withdrawn. Suppose, further, that after this he should preach doctrines, or write books containing doctrines which were heretical, how were they to deal with him? Possibly they might have a man receiving the third of the income of a benefice preaching or writing opinions that were heretical, and yet they would be unable to punish him. There was a provision in the Bill enacting that in case the clergyman, after availing himself of the benefit of the Act, engaged in any ecclesiastical duty, the Bishop of the diocese he had quitted and the Bishop of the diocese to which he went might settle between themselves how far his retiring income might be reduced. But if the clergyman subsequently wrote heretical works or preached doctrines which were not orthodox, he might go to places where there was no diocese and accept, for instance, the charge of a congregation on the coast of Italy, living in a climate much more agreeable than that of England, and drawing not only his Italian salary but also a third of the income of his former benefice. He hoped that the right rev. Prelate would deal with the various questions to which he had pointed attention.

EARL STANHOPE said, that most of these matters would very rightly be considered in Committee; but he did not think that they furnished any ground to resist the present Bill. The noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Romilly) seemed to treat very lightly the evils of the system as it existed now. But was it a light matter to a parish to find itself tied to an incumbent who had come, perhaps, to that grievous pass of extreme old age—

Nomina servorum nec vultum agnoscit amici;”—an incumbent become wholly infirm and incompetent, and able at most to read forth once a week the appointed Services?

Was this a light matter for the feelings of the incumbent himself? Yet how could such an incumbent be expected to retire from his benefice, unless the law provided a fixed though moderate income for the sustenance of himself and his family when he retired? This same measure, in principle, had already been applied to the Bench of Bishops in a temporary Act, and it had already produced the happiest effects. With this view of the question, he (Earl Stanhope) tendered his thanks to the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Winchester) for introducing the measure, and he had every hope that, if the second reading were passed, the defects complained of could be remedied in Committee. Much had been said of the rights of patrons: no doubt it was of importance that the rights of patrons should be protected; but still, if the interests of the patron and of the parish should happen to be in conflict, the interests of the parish should certainly prevail.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative: Bill read 2^a accordingly.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 20th February, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) [45].

First Reading—Stamp Act (1870) Amendment * [46].

Third Reading—Princess Louise's Annuity * [24]; Provisional Order Bills (Committees) * [12], and passed.

CARACAS—BRITISH CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Proceedings, or Selections from the Proceedings of the Mixed Commission on British Claims which sat in Carácas in 1868, of which Mr. Joel was a member?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, in reply, that there would be no objection to present the Reports to which the hon. Member referred, if he thought the matter of sufficient importance; but it was only fair to inform him that the documents in question were very voluminous, extending over 647 pages, and the expense of printing them would cost about £40.

METROPOLIS—LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. BUXTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has considered the great facility with which London has been provided with the requisite organization for the election of the School Board; and, whether he does not think it probable that he may be able to prepare a measure for the creation of a constitution for the Metropolis in the present year?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, his hon. Friend would, he trusted, excuse him if he failed to see the analogy between the creation of a school board and the carrying out of a scheme for the local government of London. The London school board was a mere addition to the existing powers—an addition that was hailed with satisfaction by all the existing authorities. Any system of local government for London that would be worthy of acceptance by the House must interfere with existing institutions, both ancient and modern; and no Government could exercise ordinary prudence which did not foresee that there would be to any such measure a considerable amount of opposition, involving, of course, a great consumption of time. It was after a full consideration of all these circumstances, and with the utmost reluctance, that the Government had decided that they would be unable in the present Session to introduce, in addition to the other measures they intended to propose, a measure of such great importance.

IRELAND—ROYAL RESIDENCE.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the desire generally expressed in Ireland that there should be a Royal residence in that Country, Her Majesty's Government will propose to Parliament this Session a grant to purchase such suitable residence?

MR. GLADSTONE: That, Sir, is a question which has been for some time in the view of Her Majesty's Government; but I am not in a condition, at the present moment, to make a positive announcement respecting it to my hon. Friend.

SCOTLAND—ROAD REFORM.

QUESTION.

Mrs DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he intends to introduce during this Session a general measure of Road Reform for Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE replied that he quite recognized the importance of the subject; but he could not hold out any prospect of the introduction of a measure upon it that Session.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER UNIFORMS.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government have it in contemplation to take steps for obtaining uniformity of colour and pattern in Volunteer uniforms and equipments?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that he would be very glad to see a greater uniformity in the Volunteer uniforms than existed at present; but these were matters which had always been under the regulation of the Volunteers themselves, and there was no present intention to put any coercion upon them in regard to them.

MEDICAL ACTS.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is his intention to bring in any Bill for the amendment of the Medical Acts during the present Session?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that it was not intended to bring in such a Bill in the present Session.

Mr. Stacpoole

ARMY—MILITARY DISTRICTS.

QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table a pro forma statement of the Divisions of the Country into Military Districts, showing by examples the numbers of the troops by ranks in each district, and the arrangements for drilling or training the recruits under the new system; and, a general table of the establishment of men and horses in the British Forces, distinguishing the numbers of the men by ranks, and including therein the officers, men, and horses belonging to the administrative and all other departments?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, if the hon. Gentleman will move for a Return, I shall be happy to give it, showing the military divisions and sub-divisions and the number of regulars and auxiliary forces in each. The arrangements for drilling and training recruits are not yet completed, and, in consequence of the large number of troops at present in the country, some difficulty is experienced in finding the necessary barrack accommodation. As soon as the arrangements are completed I shall be happy to give them. Nearly all that the hon. Gentleman asks in the second part of his Question is given in the Estimates; but if he wishes to have it in a more compendious form I shall be ready to give it.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce this Session any Bill to amend or vary the provisions of the Metropolitan Board of Works Loans Act, 1869; and, if so, whether such Bill would be introduced at an early period; and, if the Government is aware that the Metropolitan Board have introduced three Private Bills which, if passed, would extend their borrowing powers to the amount of £275,000 in excess of the ten millions fixed as the maximum in the said Act of 1869?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he believed that a Bill was in course of preparation to explain and amend the Board of Works Loans Act, 1869; but it had not yet been finally settled or submitted to the judgment of the Government. As to the three Private Bills to which the hon. Member referred, it was quite true that it was proposed to create stock under the Loans Act to provide the funds necessary to complete the improvements contemplated by those three Bills. Of course, those proposals stood on their own merits; but there was nothing new in their principle, similar Bills having been introduced last Session.

ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE.

QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the scheme proposed for promoting Officers by selection above the rank of Captain, in the event of the abolition of purchase, is to be extended to the Ordnance Corps, the Indian Army, the Marines, and the non-purchase branches of the service generally; and, what will be the position of Candidates for direct Commissions who have passed their examinations but have not yet been appointed, and also of those gentlemen whose names are now down for a Commission, and are waiting their turn for examination?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the statement I made had no reference to the Native Indian Army, the Marines, or to the Ordnance Corps. The detailed regulations are, as I stated, under the consideration of eminent military officers, and it would be premature to make any statement as to their application or otherwise to the Ordnance Corps. The proposals will not affect the Indian Army or the Marines. There are now, I think, about 500 candidates who have already passed. They will receive commissions in their turn according to the prospect held out to them by the regulations published at the time. The commissions will be without purchase, and will be given subject to any conditions which it may be thought right to impose for insuring competency, of which full notice will be given. As regards those now waiting for examination, they will have to enter the Army through one or other of the modes which may be laid down. Variety seems to be desirable in this respect, and the modes to which I referred as probable were—

1. Sandhurst, by competitive examination. 2. Subalterns of the Militia. 3. The Universities, as recommended by the Royal Commission. 4. General public, by competitive examination.

EDUCATION BILL (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether, considering the delay which has taken place in the delivery of the Scotch Education Bill, he still intends to take the Second Reading on this day week? He would also beg to ask when the Bill would be delivered?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, he believed the Bill would be delivered that afternoon and circulated tomorrow. He feared it might not be in his power to take the second reading on the day mentioned; but, if it was, he should not willingly lose that opportunity.

PRISON MINISTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he will be prepared to introduce the promised Bill based on the Report of the Select Committee on Prison Ministers of last year; and whether it be the intention of the Government to pass it in the present Session?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, a Bill had been prepared based on the Report of the Select Committee that sat last year. He was unable at present to name the day when it would be introduced; but he hoped it would be an early one, and that the measure would receive the sanction of the House that Session.

TREATY OF PARIS (1856).—QUESTION

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table the Despatches to which Sir Andrew Buchanan refers (page 13 of Correspondence respecting the Treaty of March 30, 1856) in the following sentence:—

“I have long foreseen that a proposal on the part of Russia for the revision of the Treaty would not be long delayed; and I have frequently expressed this opinion to your Lordship and to the late Earl of Clarendon?”

MR. GLADSTONE: It is quite true, Sir, that the noble Lord has quoted correctly from Sir Andrew Buchanan's expressions on this question, and it is also quite true that despatches have been received from time to time from Sir Andrew Buchanan intimating his expectation that, in all likelihood, Russia would, within a limited period, ask for the revision of the Treaty. But those have been confidential despatches; they were expressive of the surmises and anticipations of Sir Andrew Buchanan, and we do not think it would be desirable to produce them. It is fair to say that those anticipations of Sir Andrew Buchanan did not apparently refer to any proceedings such as were taken last autumn; they were anticipations of a proceeding which would have been, to all appearance, a perfectly legitimate and regular one—namely, an application to the Powers for the reconsideration of some parts of the Treaty.

ARMY—MILITARY LABOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Committee which he stated early last Session had been appointed by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to draw up Regulations for extending the system of "Military Labour to Military Works," and for enabling every man in the Army desirous of working at a trade to obtain employment, have made any Report; and, if so, if he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL replied that he would have no objection to lay the Report in question upon the Table.

SCOTLAND—TITLES TO LAND.

QUESTION.

MR. GORDON said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill relating to the Titles to Land and other Heritable Rights in Scotland; and, if so, whether he will name an early day on which to introduce such Bill, so as to afford sufficient time for consideration of its provisions?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, it was his intention to introduce a Bill upon the subject referred to in the hon. Member's Question, and also one dealing with the law of entail; but he was not at present in a position to name a day for the introduction of those measures.

ARMY ORGANIZATION BILL.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I wish to take this opportunity of putting a Question to the Secretary of State for War, of which I have given him private Notice, with reference to the course which he proposes to take in the future with respect to the measure he has submitted to this House on the subject of the organization of the Army. The second reading of the Army Organization Bill stands fixed for Thursday next; but, of course, I presume that the right hon. Gentleman does not intend to press the measure forward on that day, in face of the fact that hon. Members have not yet seen the Bill. The position in which we now stand is this—that after an elaborate and interesting statement from the right hon. Gentleman we are left in the middle of an adjourned debate upon the number of men to be granted. The point on which I am anxious for information is this, Whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to take a full discussion upon the whole of this large scheme upon going into Committee of Supply, or upon the second reading of the Army Organization Bill? I understand that copies of the Bill will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow; and, under those circumstances, I venture to express a hope that the Government will not unduly force on the discussion upon it. I should hope that the discussion would not be taken until next Thursday week.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, it is most important that full time should be given to the House for consideration of the measure before they are called upon to express an opinion upon it. I hope that the Bill will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow. I also think that in a measure of this kind the second reading of the Bill affords the natural and legitimate opportunity for a full discussion of the proposal it contains. I am anxious to make all reasonable progress with the Bill; but still, I think, every hon. Member should have a fair opportunity of examining the provisions of the measure. I therefore do not propose to fix the second reading of the Bill earlier than Thursday week.

MR. WHITE said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes to make the Army Estimates or the Army Organization Bill the first Order of the Day for Thursday week?

MR. CARDWELL: I propose, Sir, that the second reading of the Army Organization Bill should precede the Army Estimates.

ARMY ORGANIZATION BILL—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE.—QUESTIONS.

In reply to Mr. GUEST,

MR. CARDWELL said, the intention is to indemnify officers out of a public fund for that which they will no longer receive from a private one in respect of the regulation and customary price of their present commissions. What, therefore, they would have received before they will receive now, and this extends to claims under Section 1,069 of the Royal Warrant.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether those gentlemen who had passed out of Sandhurst and were now waiting for Commissions were still to have precedence over those who had passed their examinations for direct Commissions, but had not yet been gazetted; whether gentlemen who had passed out of Sandhurst were all to stand in one list for Commissions, irrespective of their names being down for purchase or not; and, whether all gentlemen were to have their Commissions free, or were some to have them free and some by purchase?

MR. CARDWELL: Those who have passed out of Sandhurst, and are waiting for commissions, will still have precedence over the others who have passed. Those who have passed out of Sandhurst will all stand on one list—the A list first, and the B second. All are to be without purchase. The commissions given without purchase will, of course, not be saleable.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMISSION. QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has received information that statements have appeared in several of the New York journals that the Commissioners had been empowered to take into consideration an offer by the United States for the purchase of all the British North-American Colonies; whether Her Majesty's Government had received any such proposal; and, whether the Government Instructions to the Commissioners do not entirely preclude them from taking into consideration such a proposal for the diminution of the Empire?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we have received no such proposal as that mentioned by my hon. Friend, and I am in a state of total and absolute ignorance upon the subject. But I may, perhaps, be permitted to say, further, that I hope that while the negotiations in America are in progress, the hon. Member will not think it necessary to ask questions in this House founded upon mere anonymous authorities.

NEUTRALIZATION OF THE BLACK SEA TREATY OF PARIS (1856).

OBSERVATION.

SIR HENRY LYTON BULWER said, he wished to draw the attention of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the circumstance that it was erroneously stated in the Blue Book relating to the Treaty of 1856, that he had passed the Dardanelles in 1868, instead of 1864.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD explained that it was a typographical error, which would be corrected in any subsequent issues of the Papers. He was obliged to his right hon. Friend for calling his attention to the matter. The correct date at which he had passed the Dardanelles was in September, 1862, and attention had been first called to this by the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he trusted the House would accord him its favour while he withdrew a word which he had used in addressing the House on Thursday last. In referring to the case of the accounts of the Duchy of Lancaster, and in intending to say that those accounts might advantageously be submitted to considerable revision, he had made use of the word "corruption"—a word which he now wished to withdraw. Anyone accustomed to speak in that House would know how difficult it was to keep watch and ward over every word, and he had used the word "corruption" unadvisedly, and certainly not in the sense that had since been attributed to it by some persons. He should much regret giving pain to anyone, and therefore he wished most unreservedly to withdraw the expression.

UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL—[BILL 6.]
(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Goschen.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. VERNON HARCOURT rose to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government with reference to this measure. The foundation of this Bill was that it should apply to "Colleges and Universities now subsisting," not to such as might be created in the future. That was the case with the measure introduced last year, and it would be in the recollection of hon. Members that a discussion then ensued upon his Motion that the words "now subsisting" should be omitted, and that the right hon. Gentleman entered into a compromise with respect to the matter under which he undertook, in the event of the Amendment not being pressed, that the Government would introduce a separate Bill, with the view of providing that a charter should not be granted to any College or University for the future without the consent of Parliament. He now wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was the intention of the Government to carry, pari passu with the present measure, a Bill such as the one he had referred to?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that subject to a certain reservation, he thought his hon. and learned Friend was accurate in the reference he had made to the circumstances of last year; but that reservation was this—that it was never intended on the part of the Government, nor was it ever stated, as far as he understood or remembered, that they did intend to make the power of granting charters hereafter subject to the consent of Parliament, or to impose any limitation which did not now exist in the prerogative. What was said, according to his recollection and that of the Solicitor General, was this—that provision should be made that the grant of charters to Colleges or Universities should be so regulated that Parliament should have an opportunity of objecting to it. He had to apologize to the House for having omitted to refer to the matter before, and he would take care that a provision was introduced with the view of carrying out the undertaking of last year.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the question whether Her Majesty's Government would sanction the establishment by charter of a Roman Catholic University had been strongly agitated, and he hoped the hon. Member who had recently addressed the House would have an opportunity, in the course of this discussion of stating whether his question had reference to the establishment of such an University, or to the founding of a new University in connection with the Church of England, which was about to be divorced from the existing Universities. The business before the House related to both these subjects; for the Bill under discussion was one step towards the disestablishment of the Church of England, and the Bill standing next upon the Paper (the Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill) was one which would, if passed, make a long stride towards the establishment of the Church of Rome.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Persons taking lay academical degrees or holding lay academical or collegiate offices not to be required to subscribe any formulary of faith, &c.).

MR. STEVENSON moved, in page 2, lines 8 and 9, to leave out "other than a degree in divinity," his object being to make the body of the Bill more consistent with the intention of the Bill as disclosed in the Preamble than it then was. He moved a similar Amendment last year, when he received the support of a majority of independent Liberal Members. He was met with the objection that if persons not members of the Church of England were allowed to take divinity degrees in the Universities it would be impossible to exclude them from the Professorial chairs in theology. He did not think this consequence would follow, as the Church must always have the power of appointing to its theological Professorships only such persons as were in its opinion theologically sound; and in addition there would be this other safeguard that, as a rule, the occupancy of and emoluments attached to professorial chairs in theology were attached to livings in the Church. All he desired was to remove the barrier which Parliament had imposed by passing the Act of Uniformity and which Parliament ought now to remove. In the University of Glasgow any person who had obtained the degree of M.A., and had passed through a theological course, either in England or Scotland, was entitled, after passing a satisfactory examination, to proceed to the degree of B.D., the subsequent degree of D.D. being simply matter for a further examination in proof of higher theological scholarship. There was no necessity for declaring adherence to the Established Church of the country. In the other Scotch Universities the principle was substantially the same, though the details were different in some particulars. He dismissed as utterly improbable the fear that opening the divinity degrees in the Universities would be sought by the enemies of Christianity as a footing for attacking its truths. But, apart from that consideration, he moved his Amendment on the broad ground that all University degrees ought not to be confined to the members of one particular Church, but should be free to all.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 8 and 9, to leave out the words "other than a degree in divinity."—(Mr. Stevenson.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall not attempt, on this occasion, to enter at large into the discussion of the Motion of my hon. Friend; but all that I would say bearing on the merits of the proposition is that, according to the account he has given of the Motion, it is perfectly plain it would not go far enough to effect the object he has in view, so far as the practice established in our ancient Universities in England is concerned. And it would not do this, because my hon. Friend says he would not take away the limitation upon the appointment of the Professors who constitute the theological faculty; but it is evident that if he left the Professors subject to the operation of an exclusive test the candidates for degrees who belong to other forms of religion would be in the very peculiar and anomalous position of being liable to be judged exclusively by persons of another faith; and it would be very difficult, indeed, for them to be certain that a perfect impartiality would be exercised in passing judgment upon them. There are many other difficulties in the Motion on which I will not detain the Committee at length; but I must observe that I do not quite understand where it is my hon. Friend wishes to stop. He wishes to have degrees in divinity thrown open; but what is divinity? He says he wishes that the Professors of different Churches should be allowed to obtain their certificates of proficiency in a particular form; but what, again, are Churches? For example, is there a Buddhist Church, and would not my hon. Friend require a test if he wished to prevent Buddhists obtaining divinity degrees in English Universities? By Churches, he probably means the various fragments of the Christian world. I do not know; but it is quite evident that if he means to admit all those who profess Christianity in some form or other to degrees in divinity, and to exclude all who do not, he must discover and provide by law some test in order to determine what is Christianity and what is not. My hon. Friend has not done this. The truth is—his proposal is not in a shape in which it can take practical effect. But I do not intend to do more than point out what appeared to me the defect of my hon. Friend's proposal; I do not intend at all to enter upon the merits of his proposal, because, so far as the Government are concerned, we should be wasting the time of the Committee if we did so. The Government has already ventured to acquaint the House—I use the term "venture" advisedly—that we regard this proceeding as a sequel to what took place last year. We propose to send to the House of Lords the Bill which we sent last year. So far, therefore, as the Government are concerned, it is a question of going forward with this Bill. We do not think it expedient to send to the House of Lords a Bill differing materially from the Bill we sent last year. Consequently, it is not in my power to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend; and, that being so, it is better that I should waive any lengthened discussion upon its merits. The very same remark, I am bound to say, will apply to the other Amendments that are on the Paper. The Amendment of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. C. Bentinck) it would not be in our power, under any consideration, to adopt; and with regard to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), my hon. Friend near me (the Solicitor General) will say a word on that subject. The plan now before the House is the only plan that we, as a Government, can go upon on the present occasion. We wish this matter to be brought to a speedy issue. If our plan fail, my hon. Friend, or anyone else, will have an opportunity of trying a different proposal. With these few words, I have only to say that I am sorry to be obliged to say "No" to the Amendment.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR: This Bill has reached its present condition from the strong desire of the nation that our great Universities should open up their means of culture and knowledge to all classes of the people. If the Bill be only partial in its operation, then the desire to render these institutions truly national has not been fully accomplished. The Preamble to the Bill is comprehensive in its aspirations, and the securities which it reserves for religious instruction are in no way affected by the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Stevenson). There are three superior Faculties in the Universities—those of Medicine, Law, and Divinity—all of them professing to teach their several kinds of knowledge, and to give degrees as evidence of an acquired culture in them. In two, as well as in the Faculty of Arts, the Bill proposes to dis sever knowledge from belief; but, in one of them, it keeps knowledge and belief in the Episcopal Church firmly bound together. Is there any good reason for the exception? The answer made to us last year by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government is that a degree really means ability to teach the knowledge embraced in it, and that it would be anomalous to confer a degree in theology in a University unless the graduate were allowed to teach in that University. I do not deny that the right hon. Gentleman is correct as a question of ancient University history, and that the title of graduate did imply power to teach. So did the title of Esquire once mean that of shield-bearer to a knight; but its special meaning is now obsolete, and so is that of a degree. The title of B.A. certainly does not imply that its possessor is capable of acting as a University teacher, but simply that he possesses a certain amount of culture—generally, indeed, vastly inferior to that of a Tutor or Professor. So completely had degrees lost their original meaning that from the period of the Restoration to the year 1800 the degree of B.A. was given without examination, and simply indicated four years of pupillary residence, and therefore an unknown quantity of knowledge. Well, that is very nearly the position that the degree of B.D. is in at the present time. It has no significance either of high learning or of teaching power. The University of Oxford has cast off its legitimate duties of examination upon the Bishops of the Episcopal Church, for its only evidence of the learning and capacity of the candidate is that he shall be in Priest's Orders, the whole of the University duty being to hear three sermons on subjects contained in the Holy Scriptures. I would prefer to speak of the degrees as being those of theology rather than of divinity, for the former indicates the science of the subject with which we were dealing. Now, I think it will be of great value to these degrees if they are made subjects of knowledge, but not merely of a particular form of belief, for then the University would be forced to resume its proper functions of examination. The field of theological science is a wide one, and ought in national Universities to be open to the members of every Church. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government asks what subjects could be included in such degrees, and how are they to be defined? I will reply by reading an extract from the Edinburgh University Calendar—

"This degree shall be conferred only after the candidate has completed his theological curriculum with a view to the ministry in the Church or denomination to which he belongs, and after he has passed a satisfactory examination in the various branches of theology which are taught in the University—namely, the Evidences of Revealed Religion, Systematic Theology, Hebrew, Ecclesiastical History, Biblical Criticism, and Biblical Antiquities."

Surely, this curriculum is large enough to distinguish theology as a science. In this scheme there is no exclusion of any kind. A Unitarian or a Roman Catholic may take a degree, provided that, in addition to a knowledge of their own dogmas, they are able also to explain the answers which the Trinitarians would give to the former and the Protestants to the latter. The candidates are not asked to express any particular form of belief, far less a special form of it laid down by law, but only to exhibit what they know; and knowledge of dogmas is a part of systematic theology. The Scotch Universities even accept a theological curriculum outside of themselves; but the Amendment of my hon. Friend does not hope to achieve such an instance of liberality. In conclusion, I support his Amendment, because I believe that it will render our Universities wholly national, and because it will raise the standard of theological degrees by fixing upon the Universities their proper functions of examination, and restoring to such degrees those securities of culture and knowledge which their possession professes to imply.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for the very candid admission which he had just made. The hon. Gentleman said the scope of this Bill was to emancipate two out of the three great branches of knowledge from belief. The hon. Gentleman wanted to emancipate the third—theology. Therefore they had the admission plainly and roundly from his own mouth that there was such a thing as unbelieving theology—that theology or divinity might be consistent with unbelief. It was evident that it was his intention, and the intention of the hon. Member who moved this Amendment (Mr. Stevenson), and he supposed of that mysterious majority of independent Liberals who supported the Government, to separate theology from belief, and to set up a great standard of unbelief as the scope of the religious teaching in our English Universities. The hon. Member who had just spoken, notwithstanding his learning and acuteness, had, he regretted to say, committed two great blunders. The hon. Member said he used the word “theology” rather than “divinity,” because he assumed it to be of some different colour. But the word “divinity” was simply derived from the Latin word for God, and the word “theology” from the Greek word for God. That was the only difference. But then the hon. Gentleman appealed to the old idea that a degree implied teaching, and he talked of emancipating degrees of divinity from the control of the Bishops. Was the hon. Gentleman aware that a person could not take the first degree in divinity till seven years after he had obtained a Master's degree? But, to come to the main question, how were they to work the plan of granting degrees in theology to unbelievers? Were the existing faculties to be the examiners, or was there to be a separate external Board? Or, in the third place, were they to duplicate, triplicate, or multiply twenty-fold the different degrees of divinity? Were all the different denominations to have their own degrees? He traversed the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman that there was any great feeling among the sects of the country for opening the divinity degrees. No doubt the movement for opening the Universities was generally popular, and this Bill was the legitimate expression of it; but there was no expression of a desire on the part of any Nonconformist body for opening the theological degrees, because they knew they could not do so without diminishing their power to enforce their own belief on their own ministers. They knew that to open the divinity degree would be to make a latitudinarian degree. He should certainly vote against the Amendment.

MR. BUXTON, in supporting the Amendment, said the principle of the Bill was that the Universities ought not to belong to the Church of England, but to the whole country. The desire to carry out that principle was the motive which actuated those who had supported the various Bills for the abolition of tests in the Universities. He could not understand why the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. B. Hope) should wish to retain the few miserable scraps remaining of the old system. Now, one of the tests which his hon. Friend (Mr. Stevenson) wished to remove had for its object to confine certain degrees in the University to members of the Church of England. His hon. Friend opposite (Mr. B. Hope) argued that the test must be retained because divinity was of a certain character. He (Mr. Buxton) altogether denied that. He ventured to think there was a science of theology which had no connection with one Church more than another, and it was that, and that alone, which Professors of Theology ought to be permitted to teach. He thought it was most desirable that a Bill like the present, which embodied so important a principle, should be a complete and consistent measure, should carry out that distinctive principle to the uttermost, and should make our Universities just as much the property and privilege of the Nonconformists as of the members of the Established Church.

MR. B. SAMUELSON rose to take notice of an expression of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that the Bill was a sequel of the events of last Session. On the contrary, he believed that, in the opinion of those out-of-doors, and of a majority of those who supported the right hon. Gentleman in that House, this Bill was not regarded as the proper sequel of the events of last Session. The only fit and legitimate sequel to the dilatory action of the House of Lords would have been a Bill abolishing all religious distinctions whatever in reference to the degrees, honours, and privileges of our Universities; and it would be better that this Bill should not pass than that it should pass in its present shape, retaining any portions, no matter how small, of those distinctions. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope) had spoken of dissociating belief from divinity, and he went on to speak of unbelief. Now, he begged to remark that certain persons were too fond of charging with unbelief those who did not hold the same belief as themselves; but he would remind the Committee that sincere and earnest belief might very well exist quite independently of belief in the theological dogmas of the Church of England. The time had certainly come to assert this principle, seeing that Convocation had recently ejected from the task of Biblical revision a most distinguished and competent scholar, simply because his religious opinions differed in some respects from those of the Episcopal Bench. There was a time when the theologians of this country ranked high among their brethren in the world; but he was afraid that that time had gone by, and if they were to put an end to criticism by a hard and fast line like that imposed by the Act of Uniformity, he did not believe the theology of this country would ever re-gain the position which he should like to see it hold as a science.

Mr. Buxton

MR. HORSMAN said, he had not intended to take any part in this discussion, and rose merely to notice a most extraordinary misrepresentation by the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) of a remark which had fallen from the hon. Member for the Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities (Dr. Lyon Playfair). The hon. Member opposite had said that his hon. Friend had advocated that theology should be emancipated from belief—that was, from any belief. But that was not the recommendation of his hon. Friend, for what he had said was that he wished theology to be emancipated from the belief imposed by law—in other words, from Church of England belief. Was that unreasonable or wrong? It seemed to him quite the contrary. It meant, in fact, the emancipation of men from the immorality of conforming with their lips to points of doctrine which many who took the test did not believe in their hearts. He had always been a strong opponent of tests for that very reason; and not only for what they excluded, but also for what they admitted. They were injurious to religion; they diminished the sanctity of oaths; and while they opened the door wide to infidels, they shut it in the face of many conscientious believers. No argument was necessary in these days to prove the uselessness of tests as means for securing uniformity of opinion in the Church. Was it not well known that every diversity of belief and unbelief was to be found in those Governing Bodies that had taken all those tests; aye, and even among the clergy of the Church of England itself? Hon. Gentlemen talked of unity of belief as the great duty and advantage. Did they attain it? Were not the diversities of belief in the Church of England a daily scandal, its weakness and its shame? How many tests had been taken from the day of his first degree to that of his consecration by Bishop Colenso? Had not the High Church and the Low Church parties censured the Prime Minister for having appointed to a bishopric a contributor to the Essays and Reviews? From the first day that he entered the House he had always been an enemy of tests. He had opposed them on every occasion, and he should therefore feel bound to support the Amendment.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE trusted that when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) again read him a lecture he would inform himself of the point at issue and of the general course of the debate. No one was talking of tests. The question under discussion was divinity degrees, for which no one could be a candidate who was not in Orders in the Church of England. All who had addressed the Committee before the right hon. Gentleman had spoken to the point, though on different sides.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 140: Majority 45.

MR. FAWCETT rose to propose an Amendment, the object of which, he said, was to render the Bill more complete, logical, and satisfactory. If it were carried the result would be that clerical as well as lay tests would be abolished, and those restrictions done away with which were imposed in favour of clerical Fellowships and Headships. No proposal, he ventured to state, would meet with a more unanimous support from the Liberals throughout the country than that which he was about to make, and there was not one of them, he felt assured, who would not concur in the opinion that a measure which should continue clerical Fellowships and Headships would not provide a solution of the question at issue even for a single hour. The Committee were well aware of the injustice and the wrong which were inflicted on distinguished students at the Universities, who, after an illustrious career there, were, at the last moment, because they did not happen to belong to the Church of England, deprived of honours which were much coveted and prized. He would not take up the time of hon. Members by entering into the history of such exclusiveness; the country had condemned it, and it was now maintained only by the vote of an irresponsible branch of the Legislature. Mischievous and unjust as were lay tests, clerical tests were not less so in their influence. Anyone who was acquainted with the Universities must be aware of the baneful effect which was produced on young men of 22 or 23 by prizes of £300 a year and a valuable position, tempting them to enter into Holy Orders at a time when their characters and tastes were still unformed, and thus to take an ill-considered step, which afterwards they found it impossible to retrace. Many hon. Members would, no doubt, be surprised to hear that if the Bill were to pass in its present shape one-third of the Fellowships and three-fourths of the Headships at Oxford would be left untouched by its provisions. At Cambridge nearly three-fourths of the Headships and the most valuable of the Fellowships could only be held by persons in Holy Orders. It was a mockery, therefore, to say that this measure would make the Universities great national institutions to which all Her Majesty's subjects, of whatever religious opinions, would be admitted on fair and equitable terms. The Prime Minister did not dispute that the principle advocated by the Amendment was a sound one, nor that clerical Fellowships were indefensible, but gave the extraordinary reason for supporting it that it was necessary to the success of the Bill to send it up to the other House in the same form in which it had been presented last Session. Suppose, being anxious in the same way to consult the feelings of the Peers, the right hon. Gentleman had introduced last year only a partial measure for the disendowment and disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the Peers had practically rejected it by referring the Bill to a Select Committee! He (Mr. Fawcett) did not wish to be disrespectful to the House of Lords; but he thought the best way to treat that Assembly, as well as political opponents in this House, was to be perfectly fair and candid with them. It was not well to send up a measure to the other House with a reservation behind it that a larger proposal should supplement it by-and-by. The fairest plan was to say at once what measure would satisfy the country and the Liberal party in this House. He was sure the Upper House would much more appreciate such a policy. Without pretending to speak in the name of either, he believed he was echoing an opinion shared by many when he said that a settlement of the question would not be obtained and that no solution would be satisfactory until they abolished not only lay tests, but also clerical tests, from our Universities. The hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley), on the opening day of the Session, had stated that it was the wish of the great majority of the nation to settle the question for ever. It was with that view he (Mr. Fawcett) proposed the Amendment. After an agitation which had lasted ten years the Universities required peace and repose. Many men there who were originally in favour of maintaining these tests would say—"Do not let this question be treated piecemeal; if tests are to be abolished, let them be abolished once for all." With such a majority as they had in that House, it was not creditable to the Liberal party to toy and retain what he could not abstain from calling these miserable snips and remnants of ecclesiastical ascendancy. With their abolition, and not till then, the Universities would become great national institutions, all classes being equally entitled to the advantages which those ancient seats of learning afforded. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving to leave out Proviso 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, to leave out from the words "Provided, That," in line 28, to the word "office," in line 38."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had voted against the Amendment last year, but he intended to support it on the present occasion. The principle involved in it was really the principle of the Bill. The question was whether you were entitled to look to a man's theological opinions in considering whether he was entitled to obtain a Fellowship. To his mind the present system was putting a premium upon hypocrisy, and he doubted whether the men got by that bait were worth the having. The whole of the conditions on which Fellowships were held wanted revision. Celibacy, for example, was an absurd condition. So was the condition that a man who had land worth £300 a year must not hold a Fellowship; whereas if he made £5,000 a year at the Bar or £50,000 by commerce it did not matter. He once knew a former Member of that House, a Queen's Counsel, who was a Fellow of Cambridge for 52 years, and who never entered the doors of his College except for the purpose of punishing its wines. He thought the question of Fellowships should be dealt with as a whole.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had taken the conduct of the Bill, which had last Session been introduced by the Solicitor General, not because the First Minister believed that he or anyone else could conduct it more ably than the Solicitor General had conducted it, but in order to mark, in the most emphatic way, that it was to be considered as a Government measure. In return for the greater chance which this would afford of the Bill passing, was it unfair that even those who were strongly in favour of the Amendment should be expected to yield to the wish of the Minister that the Bill should be left in its present shape; that they should be expected to say—"As men looking to the practical result of our actions, we cannot vote for the Amendment because Ministers inform us that thereby the Bill will be imperilled, and, indeed, intimate that it will be impossible for them to carry it up to the House of Lords if this Amendment is adopted?" He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) heard Gentlemen cheer just now, because the minority in favour of the former Amendment was larger than had been expected; but if the minority had been converted into a majority, would they have cheered then? If they would, that cheer would have been the knell of the measure. ["No!"] Under this impression, as he would never vote in a minority simply because it was a minority, and as he was convinced that the success of the Amendment would be fatal to the Bill, he thought that, though abstractedly favourable to the Amendment, he was acting quite consistently, as a practical man, in voting against it.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the Amendment had been declared to be alien from the character of the Bill. Now, what was the object and character of the Bill? The object of the Bill was to completely overthrow religious inequality at the Universities; but how could anyone admit this object would be carried out as long as the holding of certain Fellowships was confined not only to the members of, but actually to the clergy of, a particular sect? The Amendment of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) had been objected to last year on the ground that serious practical difficulties would prevent its being carried out; but those practical difficulties really amounted to next to nothing, and the Amendment of this year, which had been drawn by gentlemen of great experience in such matters, completely avoided them. It had been said, too, that the Amendment would destroy the prospect of the Bill passing the House of Lords; he, however, thought it would be a material aid to that end. It might be argued that, considering how ready the House of Lords had been to throw out moderate Bills, a violent measure might stand as good a chance with them; in any case they would have the opportunity of sending the Bill back without the Amendment, and passing the rest of it on the basis of the surrender of the clerical Fellowships by this House. That was the really practical view of the matter. He had been in the habit of dividing clerical Fellows into two classes, clerical Fellows with white ties and clerical Fellows without white ties. The first class opposed almost every proposal to liberalize the Colleges; and though they acted from the purest motives, their actions had been by no means beneficial. The other class comprised those gentlemen who took Holy Orders for no other purpose but to enable them to hold Fellowships; for immediately they acquired the position they put aside all the outward and visible signs of the inward and spiritual grace, which they knew they did not possess, and became, to all appearance, non-clerical. It was hard to say which of these two classes it was most desirable to get rid of—the first, which obstructed all progress, or the other, which poisoned it at its source. On a full consideration of the matter he could come to no other conclusion than that those on the Ministerial side of the House should unhesitatingly vote with the hon. Member for Brighton.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL presumed it would be no surprise to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) to hear that the Government could not possibly accept the Amendment he had proposed; and, although it was no doubt true of the majority of those who sat on that side of the House, as the hon. Member had stated, that they owed their seats mainly to the Nonconformist body—certainly it was his own case as the representative of the city of Exeter—yet the Government did not think that by rejecting this Amendment they did anything to disentitle them to the future support of any fair judging

Nonconformist. First of all, whatever might be the opinion of academical reformers within the walls of the Universities, there had been no external action taken by them in any such direction. A deputation, representing a number of the most important Nonconforming Bodies in the country, had an interview with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and they deliberately desired that the measure should go up in its present shape with whatever aid the influence of the Government could lend it. Nor did he think that the Government were doing anything inconsistent with the desires of non-academical reformers, being moved by the hope that it would thus speedily become law. The object of the Bill was simply to render the Universities and the Colleges within them, in matters of academical degrees and offices, just as they would have been if no Act of Parliament had been passed in an opposite direction; it repealed all restrictions placed on the Universities by Acts of Parliament; it left untouched all such restrictions as were imposed by their own statutes. To do more than to deal with Parliamentary restriction would be to go beyond the province of the Bill, and in this the Government assumed an intelligent position, which they were entitled to maintain in the face of the House of Commons. Personally, however, he freely admitted, he believed, in common with any fair-minded man on the other side of the House, that the present condition of the Fellowship question was not satisfactory or could be maintained. In fact, it needed speedy amendment. In 1854 the Government of the day endeavoured, in vain, to induce the House of Commons to legislate upon it; but legislation was refused. So far as he knew about his own University, those who were most in earnest for the reform of Oxford were of opinion that there was not at present sufficient information to enable them to legislate satisfactorily or finally on a question which required such great care. It would be understood that he was not speaking to bind anyone but himself; yet, certainly, for his own part, he should be glad to see a proper inquiry ordered into the state of the Colleges and the funds of the Colleges—a thoroughly searching inquiry to ascertain what were the academical resources of the Colleges, and how they could be best applied for fulfilling the objects for which they were designed. By this Amendment it was proposed to deal with only one fragment of the very complicated questions arising out of the statutes. It was proposed to repeal a test which was no test at all—a College statute indicating that certain persons, members of Colleges, should be put to an academical test. The Government dealt with the word test in this Bill in the ordinary acceptation of the word, and left perfectly untouched the anomalies pointed out, because they were connected with another branch of the Bill. Of course, if the anomaly existed of a man with an income of £5,000 holding a Fellowship of £300, it should be at once remedied. The objection to requiring Fellows to be celibates was not so sound, because some difficulty would be found in governing the Colleges of Oxford by a set of married Fellows. He hoped that the great party on which the Government had to lean for support would see that this was a practical question, and not merely one upon which they ought to vote for the sake of giving a vote. The measure had been brought in bond fide for the purpose of passing it, and they had every hope that if it were allowed to be pressed forward this year it would be passed into law. It would be a great and beneficial change, both in the Universities and the Colleges as it stood, and he trusted the Committee would do nothing to prevent its passing in its present shape, which was the only form in which it could pass with the approval of the Government.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, the reasoning of his hon. and learned Friend (the Solicitor General) had failed to convince him. His hon. and learned Friend had said that the Amendment proposed was part of a great question which would have to be dealt with separately; but it was just that part with which the present Bill purported to deal. The preamble of the Bill recited that it was a "Bill for the Abolition of Tests." Now, he could see no distinction in principle between imposing tests at the outset of a man's University career, and telling him ultimately that he would be deprived of the fruits of his learning and intellectual superiority if, within a given time, he did not enter into Holy Orders. In fact, unless this Amendment were adopted, the Bill would be inconsistent.

The Solicitor General

His hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) seemed to imply that hon. Members who were going to support this Amendment would do so because they knew they would be voting in a minority. He voted on the last occasion, as he should do in the coming Division, with no expectation of being in a minority; and he could only regret that the minority was composed of men who were among the most earnest supporters of Her Majesty's Government. He gave full credit to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for his desire to give effect to the claims of the Nonconformists; but the Government were mistaken in the course which they had adopted. He, for one, could not understand why more respect had been shown to the House of Lords, who had rejected the Bill, than to the great bulk of the Liberal party, who had voted for it. Nor could he understand how respect would be shown to the House of Lords by sending them back the Bill in the same form in which it had been before them on the last occasion. He regretted to find himself at variance with the right hon. Gentleman; but he felt bound to vote for the Amendment.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID explained that he had not intended to express any opinion about the expectations with which hon. Members had voted for the Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) has referred, in very kind terms, to the feelings by which we have been influenced in introducing this Bill, and has shown every disposition to appreciate the position in which we find ourselves placed. I will not go over the general argument of the Solicitor General, because I subscribe to everything which he has stated. Everyone conversant with the state of the Universities will admit that the whole subject of Fellowships requires to be dealt with in a comprehensive manner. This is no new opinion of mine. When the Bill relating to the Universities was introduced in 1854 it was framed very carefully with this object in view; but we found that the difficulties of the time and the circumstances were so great, and the House was so unwilling to entertain the subject, and to deal extensively with the conditions attaching to the tenure of Fellowships, that we were compelled to recede from our undertaking. I wish to grapple with the leading proposition of my hon. and learned Friend who has just sat down. My hon. and learned Friend has made an appeal to me, and I will in turn make one to him. He says it is not respectful to the House of Lords to send back to them a measure which they have rejected. Now, the House of Lords, in the exercise of its discretion—I refer to this as a matter of history—thought fit not to pass this Bill; but they did not reject it. It may be said by those who are disposed to take a strict view of the proceedings of the House of Lords, that they adopted an indirect method of getting rid of it. Any hon. Member who chooses is freely at liberty to entertain and urge that opinion. Her Majesty's Government are not free to urge it; it would not be fair or just, in our view, to say that the House of Lords had taken an oblique course for the purpose of getting rid, indirectly, of what they did not choose to get rid of directly. Consider the facts. It was on the 14th of July that the Bill was presented to the House of Lords last year, and it was the first time that it had been presented to them as a positively enacting measure, and as a measure introduced upon the responsibility of the Government. At that moment we had just sent to the House of Lords the Irish Land Bill and the English Education Bill, in addition to all the other measures of the Session. There were also circumstances connected with the University of Oxford in particular to which I might refer; but I think it would be a harsh and uncharitable judgment to pass upon the House of Lords—much as I regret their proceedings—if we were to assume that their Lordships had definitively rejected this very measure. The Bill is one which has been taken into the hands of the Government, in compliance with the wishes of the great bulk of its supporters; and we, as a Government, are bound to deal with it in accordance with those principles of respect which should regulate the conduct of the Government in dealing with the other branch of the Legislature. We were met last year by the House of Lords with a request for information which we considered totally unnecessary. But remembering that the House of Lords arrived at a different conclusion, and that the search for information made it impossible for them to proceed with the Bill last year, we should have failed in our duty to that House if we had not taken the opportunity of allowing them again to consider the very same measure which they had not rejected, but laid aside. And we should equally have failed in our duty to the supporters of the measure in the House of Commons if we had not used our best diligence and exertion to introduce the Bill at the commencement of the Session, and to pass it with all the expedition and despatch in our power. I was rather surprised at the speech of the hon. Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid), in which he laid such stress upon the supposed relations between the Government and the House of Lords; but the hon. Gentleman is quite right in supposing that we are desirous that the measure should go to the House of Lords under circumstances giving it the best chance of passing into law. I do not presume to find fault with those who take a different course; but in undertaking the conduct of this Bill, we did not conceal what we thought to be right and possible in the position in which we then stood. Those who are interested in this measure, after learning the decision of the Government, still persist in the request that we should undertake the conduct of the measure, and urge it forward as we best could. It is under these circumstances that we ask the Committee to vote against the Amendment.

MR. HORSMAN reminded the Committee that those hon. Gentlemen who intended to vote for the Amendment would not be adopting any new course in consequence of the rejection of the Bill by the House of Lords last year. The course of the Government was quite consistent. They introduced the Bill last year, and adhered to it in the shape in which it was introduced and proposed to the House of Lords. The course of those who agreed with the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) was quite as consistent, because they proposed and voted last year for the Amendments for which they were now going to vote. Consequently, whatever had been done by the House of Lords had no effect upon their proceedings. He voted this year as he voted last year; he voted on the same Resolution, and upon the same principles, and he would not be a party to per-

Buxton, C.
Fitzmaurice, Lord E.

MR. FAWCETT said, it was not his intention to move the additional clauses of which he had given Notice, as they all had reference to the question raised by the Amendment which had just been rejected. But he thought it right to say this—that the answer was a very remarkable one, for probably a Liberal Government, on a question involving Liberal principles, had never found so few of their supporters voting with them, and been opposed by so many of their strongest and best supporters. He ventured to express a hope that the Government would ponder well upon this matter, and that the constituencies would also look to it. He would not now move the new clauses of which he had given Notice, but he would raise the point again upon the Report.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member having stated that he hoped the Government would ponder upon this subject, his answer was that they had done so; that their decision was taken, and that it was irrevocable. Of course, the hon. Gentleman could take whatever course he pleased.

MR. FAWCETT moved, so that he might be in order in addressing the Committee, that the Chairman be directed to report Progress. He had not meant to say that the right hon. Gentleman had not pondered upon this question; but it was impossible for the right hon. Gentleman, or for anyone else, to have known beforehand that the question which was rejected by a large majority last Session would have been carried by the narrow majority of 22, made up almost entirely by Conservative votes, this Session. What he asked the right hon. Gentleman to do was to consider not the question itself, but the strong and almost unanimous wish expressed on this subject by his strongest and his best supporters.

MR. GLADSTONE assured his hon. Friend, when he said they had pondered this question, he did not mean that he was not sensible of the sentiments so strongly expressed, under such circumstances, by so large a proportion of those who sat on that (the Ministerial) side of the House. He did not undervalue the vote in the slightest degree; but if a Government had stated its decision, and if that decision had been taken in consequence of what it felt to be due from itself as the Executive of the country to one branch of the Legislature, his hon. Friend's candour would show him that it was impossible to uproot that decision in deference to any state of parties represented by a minority in the House of Commons. He did not speak in the slightest degree under the influence of impatience or disappointment; but he simply meant to convey to the hon. Member, in order that he might not be deceived, their settled purpose not to deviate from a perfectly clear and indisputable position of the constitutional duty of the Government in their relations to another branch of the Legislature.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, in moving, in page 2, line 44, after subsection 2 insert the following :—

“3. Nothing in this Act shall open any office to any person who is not a member of the Church of England where such office is by the intention of the founder or donor confined to a member of the said Church, and where the income of such office is payable out of the produce of property or moneys given by private persons out of their own resources since the year one thousand five hundred and sixty-two,”

said, that last year the House had not the advantage of the presence of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government when they were discussing this question, and, indeed, he had observed that until quite recently the right hon. Gentleman had never been able to look it in the face. Very probably the right hon. Gentleman recollected the number of years during which he was a consistent opponent of the Bill, and it was only since he had been compelled by the pressure of his supporters to introduce the measure as one belonging to the Government that he had been good enough to give the House the benefit of his presence on these discussions. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the measure, said the controversy was almost exhausted, and he defied human ingenuity to introduce any novelty into it; but to-night he had had the advantage of seeing that a vast deal of novelty might be introduced into it, and that many of his own supporters would be satisfied with nothing less than the total disestablishment of the Church of England and the abolition of religious education. The speeches which had been made by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House, showed clearly that concession to those hon. Gentlemen was of no use whatever, but would only lead to further demands, and that their Nonconformist supporters would be satisfied with neither more nor less than the utter destruction of the rights of property. The principle of the Amendment which he (Mr. C. Bentinck) now offered to the House was, that when a private person out of his own private resources contributed to or created an endowment for any particular purpose, that endowment ought to stand. That principle was consistent with justice, with equity, and with a due regard to the rights of property, and it had always been acknowledged by the laws of that country. The antecedents of the right hon. Gentleman on this subject were somewhat peculiar. While he was Member for the University of Oxford he always opposed this Bill, and even for two years subsequent to his defeat in 1856 he either abstained from voting or voted against the Bill of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) to abolish the Act of Uniformity. But on the 16th of March, 1868, the right hon. Gentleman rose in his place and denounced all Establishments by declaring against that of the Church of Ireland; and in the following month of July he went into the same Lobby with the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock and the hon. and learned Solicitor General on the University Tests Bill, without offering one word of apology or one word in defence of his conduct. The following year—1869—the right hon. Gentleman brought in his Irish Church Bill; and in that Bill the Government incorporated a proposal exactly similar to that which was embodied in the Amendment, the words of which were taken from the clause in the measure referred to. The ground taken then was that gifts of the property of private persons from private sources should be respected, going back as far as 1660—a date which neither the right hon. Gentleman himself nor anyone else could give any logical reason for choosing. The right hon. Gentleman stated the conditions that ought to attach to such gifts—first, that each ought to be a contribution or endowment from the private resources of a private person; second, that it ought to be devoted to the maintenance of some particular religion; and, third, that it ought to be clear what the religion was. In the other House it was arranged that a lump sum should be taken by the Church in respect of these private endowments. He desired to know what reason there was why the same principle should not be applied to the private endowments of the English Universities. It was impossible to say that the former case, being that of a Church, constituted a difference, for many of the foundations in the Colleges within the Universities were designed to educate men for the ministry of the Church. A great confusion existed in the minds of some with reference to the term “University.” It was said that the Universities should be thrown open to all men—and so they were to a very great extent. It was competent for any religious body to create an endowment in one of our Universities, and employ it for the education of members of their particular community. Very few restrictions remained to be removed to throw the Universities open to all Her Majesty's subjects; and he did not apprehend that any considerable number of Members on his own side of the House would object to a measure having that effect only. This measure, however, effected more, for it took property which, according to law, and according to the intentions of the founder, was devoted to the Church of England, from that Church. The grievance alleged by hon. Members opposite, below the Gangway, was that a non-member of the Church of England could not enjoy the privilege of a Fellowship. Could he enjoy the benefit of any other endowment founded by a private person under similar restrictions? Certainly not. Mr. Aldis, a Baptist, who took a high degree at Cambridge a few years ago, and who did not take a Fellowship, had published a pamphlet on the subject of the University Tests, which contained some great misrepresentations. Among other things he stated, in answer to the objection that the Fellowships were private foundations derived from the bequests of members of the Church of England, and that therefore it would be an infraction of the laws of property to throw them open to Nonconformists, that the objection was untrue, for all the Colleges at Cambridge, except three, were founded before the Reformation, and that therefore if they were founded for the benefit of any particular religion it must have been the Roman Catholic one. But Dr. Guest, a most distinguished member of the University of Cambridge, had shown that that statement was far removed from the truth, and that in his own College—King's College—£6,000 a year was derived from endowments given since the Reformation, while 22 Fellowships out of 32, and most of the Scholarships, had been founded since 1658. Dr. Guest went on to say that the Solicitor General proposed to sweep away all those benefactions, and that it would be just as fair for him to lay his hands on Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, and convert it to national uses. If the principle of this Bill were adopted where were we to stop? Last year the Roman Catholics protested against any investigation being made into their property, and it was well known that both in this country and in Ireland they possessed a large amount of private property applied to religious uses; and why should their property be untouched if the property of the Church of England were dealt with in this way? The present Bill had neither logic nor sense to support it—it was a measure of simple confiscation, which might ultimately hit the Nonconformists and the Roman Catholics as hard as it hit the Church of England at the present moment. He quite agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General that the Fellowships were not in a satisfactory state. It was never intended that they should be what they had become—a kind of speculation for undergraduates who went up at a comparatively late period of life, well crammed. Their object was to encourage learning in the university and the better instruction of the Undergraduates at less cost to themselves. The hon. and junior Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) was a Fellow of a College himself—not an honorary Fellow, but a Fellow receiving dividends. He was also a Professor, in receipt of a considerable salary from the University Chest. He was a pluralist, and not only a pluralist, but an abuse. He hoped, therefore, the hon. and junior Member for Brighton would repent, and either immediately resign his Fellowship or his Professorship. ["Divide!"] Considering that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the other side of the House had occupied two hours in badgering the Government, he thought they ought to allow him a quarter of an hour in which to state an intelligible principle. They always wished to stop discussion unless the discussion came from their own part of the House. With regard to the Roman Catholic Members of the House, they were bound by those who sent them to defend every scrap of property belonging to their Church; but seeing that their own endowments at Maynooth had been respected by Parliament, he did not see how they could possibly vote for the confiscation of the private property of the Church of England. He believed that the majority of the Nonconformists of this country did not desire to see the Church of England disestablished, or its University property confiscated; and so far as the Government were concerned, he called upon the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, if he had any particle of political principle left, to abide by his own decision, never yet revoked, and his own principle, never yet denied but used in support of the Irish Church Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not think the Motion of the hon. Gentleman should be entertained. The hon. Member said that in the case of the Irish Church Bill the Government proposed to reserve to the Church—a religious body about to be disestablished—such of its possessions as might fairly be considered to be in the nature, upon the whole, of donations for the support of a particular religion. If they were able to disestablish the religious education of the Universities at one stroke by this Bill, as they disestablished the Irish Church, he would not say that there might not be a very fair argument to be made in support of some proposition of this kind for the purpose of saving the special character of special foundations. But such was not the effect of this Bill. When it was first introduced many of its supporters were in the habit of urging that it left behind ample securities for religious education in the Universities and Colleges. That was his opinion, and without entertaining a conviction of that kind he could not have brought himself to give his support to the measure; and he thought that the House would be of opinion that in connection with a Bill which did not prohibit the religion of the Church of England, and which did not detach absolutely all the emoluments of the Universities from the offices and professions connected with the Church of England, it would be entirely premature and out of place to except from its operation any of those endowments of the Universities or Colleges which were not in the nature of private bequests.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he was unable to see the distinction drawn by the right hon. Gentleman. This Bill, to a certain extent, did disestablish—or, at all events, it diverted—property from one object and applied it to another, different from that intended by the founders. These being trusts under the wills of the founders, the Bill was not dealing with matters under an Act of Parliament, but with private wills and deeds. The acceptance of the Amendment would have the effect of promoting further consideration of the subject of Fellowships, in regard to which there were many questions deserving of discussion. For instance, there was some doubt as to whether life Fellowships were advantageous, and whether the holders of such offices were not deprived of a healthy stimulus to cultivate their intellectual powers, and were not diverted from pursuits which would be honourable to themselves, and useful to society. He could assure the Committee that recent legislation had had the effect of making men think very carefully about the application of these properties to purposes of this kind, for they felt at present that they had no guarantee that their bequests would not be appropriated to uses which they had never contemplated.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had been on a Committee which had inquired respecting a great mass of property provided by Roman Catholics for establishing convents and monasteries. The Roman Catholics professed that they were obliged to keep their trusts secret in order to save their property, as the purposes to which it was appropriated were contrary to law. Now, some of the supporters of the present Bill voted against the appointment of that Committee, with the view of preserving that property thus illegally held, and would have the House divert from its purposes property which was legally held. Such a tendency in legislation showed that Liberalism inclined towards Communism, and he, for one, objected to transferring to other objects property which was now legally and beneficially applied to specified purposes.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, and having regard to the hour of the night, he thought he should be doing better service by allowing the Bill to go in its integrity than by pressing his Motion. He would, therefore, withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Thursday.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to procedure at Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and for other purposes connected therewith, said: Sir, I feel that an apology is due from me to the House for bringing forward this Bill, when it would naturally expect it to be done by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), who brought forward a similar Bill last year with so much ability, and who also acted as Chairman of the Select Committee appointed by the House to inquire into this subject. The reason why I have charge of the measure is that it requires not only to be introduced, but if its principle is—as I trust it will be on the second reading—accepted by the House, it will then have to be carried through Committee; and it is doubtful whether my noble Friend, with the duties of the Office that he now has to fulfil, would be able to give his time to this matter. The same remark applies also to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. With regard to myself, although I have a good deal of administrative work to do, as I have no legislative work at present in hand, it fell to me to take charge of this Bill. I shall not, however, take advantage of that fact to trespass on the attention of the House with arguments on the abstract question of the Ballot. The question has been debated so frequently in the House, and the opinion of the House has been pronounced upon it so clearly, that I do not think it necessary to occupy its time with the arguments for and against the abstract principle of the Ballot. I may just briefly state that almost from the very first moment when I took part in politics I have been in favour of the Ballot, on the ground that bribery and intimidation are two of the greatest evils we have to contend with in connection with our Parliamentary and representative system—and that the best way to prevent an evil is to stop the cause of it. The best way to prevent a crime is to stop the motives of that crime; and I conceive that the Ballot is by far the most likely mode of removing from men the temptation either to bribe or intimidate. On that ground

I have always thought we should be more successful by the Ballot than by Corrupt Practices Acts, or by penalties, however stringent, in averting the evils so often complained of at our elections. Another ground for the adoption of the Ballot is, I think, that we have no right, in imposing on any man the duty of returning a representative, to expose him to great danger, especially when we can guard him against that danger, and protect him by so simple a mode. Even our opponents will acknowledge that the Ballot will have the advantage of enabling us to conduct our elections in an easier, quieter, and more orderly manner. I think, indeed, nobody disputes that, comparing the elections in other parts of the world where the Ballot prevails with our own elections, where it does not prevail, the advantages of peace, order, and quietness in voting are much in favour of the Ballot, and this is an argument that applies with greater force as we increase the number of the electors. I just make these few remarks to show why I myself have long felt a great interest in this question, and, as I have said, I will not detain the House with arguments on the abstract question of the Ballot, although if it should hereafter be debated, I shall do my best to defend it. I, therefore, at once proceed to that part of the statement which hon. Members will expect me to make—namely, that which refers to any changes which have been made in this Bill as compared with the one brought in last year by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington). I do not think I need dwell on those parts of the Bill which are the same as in the former Bill, because they were explained with such great clearness by my noble Friend—I mean the provisions as to the manner in which the Ballot was to be taken and in which the nominations were to be conducted. I may here state that one change which has been mentioned is not made in the Bill. I have seen it stated that possibly a permissive Ballot would be introduced; but I cannot conceive any question to which the permissive principle of legislation would be applied with less advantage than to the Ballot. The result of having a permissive Ballot would be that we should make the Ballot the subject of a reform agitation in every constituency in the kingdom—a most undesirable result; and if there be one matter on which it is more important that the House should give a clear opinion than another it is the mode in which its Members should be elected—a mode which ought to be the same throughout the country. Well, the first great change made from the Bill of last year is that we now include municipal voting along with Parliamentary voting. The grounds on which we have made that change are these—In the first place, the Report of the Committee stated that there was reason for adopting the Ballot in municipal elections almost, if not quite, as much as in Parliamentary elections. My own impression is, that there is perhaps not so much intimidation at municipal elections, although they are not without it; there is a great deal of influence on the part of men of property and employers, but not perhaps that gross form of intimidation that we have to complain of at Parliamentary elections. But there is a great deal of treating and bribery, though not perhaps with such large sums; and, at any rate, the municipal elections stand in this position—that they are so frequently made use of as a preparation for the Parliamentary elections that it is clear that any attempt to stop the evils of the one ought to be extended also to the other. In addition to that, it almost seems to me there is a particular evil connected with the mode of voting at municipal elections, and that is voting by voting papers, which the voter takes in, and which he may have signed before taking them in. Undoubtedly the plan of getting the voting papers filled up by the voters in the case of the election of guardians seems more especially to open the door to influence. The voting paper is delivered at a man's house and left with him for two or three days, and at any moment during that time any person may go to his house and either bribe or influence him to give his vote. The vote at municipal elections can, of course, be given only at a certain time; but it is open to the kind of influence I have mentioned. We have thought that if the Ballot should be established for the one class of elections, it ought to be also for the other; and I believe I may state that my noble Friend would have included a municipal Ballot in his Bill for instituting a Parliamentary Ballot if it had been thought at the time that precisely the same sort of Ballot would be applicable to the two kinds of elections. It was always intended that, after the establishment of a Parliamentary Ballot, there should be a municipal Ballot; but with the information they possessed last year the Government thought it might be necessary to take steps for the identification of Parliamentary votes after they had been given which would not have been requisite for municipal votes; and, therefore, it was deemed better to keep the two Bills distinct. This year we do not think that that necessity exists. And that brings me to the second change in our Bill, which is one of considerable importance, though one of detail, referring to the mode of taking votes by Ballot. In any Bill providing for vote by Ballot two conditions are necessary as to the machinery and manner of taking it. In the first place, I think all hon. Members will admit that the mode of taking the vote must be as simple as possible. I have had charge of this question but a very short time; but in that time the number of complicated machines for taking the Ballot that have been brought before me has quite astonished me at the wonderful ingenuity of those who take an interest in this matter. I dare say, if it had been a matter connected with my factory, I should have looked upon these contrivances with a great deal of interest and attention, as modes of manufacturing an article; but, in this particular case, we want them to be as simple as possible. It is not merely a machine that is very good if always skilfully handled and kept in good order that you require, but one that may be very badly handled, because the number of officials and people with whom you have to deal in the whole range of your voting are, many of them, so unacquainted with any complicated details that you must expect mistakes will be made wherever they can be made. The voters themselves will often be persons well qualified to say whom they prefer as their representatives, and yet unable to enter into the details of any complicated arrangement that would be successful if they did precisely as they were told, and did it also at the right time. I was quite surprised, at the late elections for the London school board, to find in how many cases men of great intelligence—although I gave them as

few directions as possible—were unable to understand how they were bound to record their votes. I was afterwards told of two or three instances where it was signed, and in one case by a member of an electioneering firm, who had taken part in a great many elections throughout the country. We must therefore keep the machinery as simple as possible. The next condition that we have to fulfil is a very important one, because the very essence of the Ballot is that it should be completely secret. By that expression I mean that a voter should not be able to prove to anyone how he has voted, because were he able to do so the object of the Ballot would be defeated, inasmuch as the person who tried to bribe or to intimidate him can demand from him, as the condition of his receiving the bribe or avoiding the danger he puts over his head, that he should prove to him how he has voted. You are, therefore, paltering with the question unless you make up your mind that if you have the Ballot it shall be such a Ballot that the voter shall be prevented from proving how he has voted. In the Bill brought forward by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) last year, these conditions were almost entirely fulfilled, and the provisions relating to them have been repeated in the present measure. We require that no paper except the official paper shall be used—that is to say, that the object of the Ballot shall not be defeated by the use of a somewhat similar paper, which would enable it to be ascertained how the vote had been given. Another condition contained in the Bill of last year has also been adopted in the present measure, and that is, that the voting paper shall not be given to the voter until he enters the voting booth. This is a most important point, because in reviewing the results of the French elections under the Ballot system I have found that almost all the evils that have followed in their train have been occasioned by the fact that the Governments of the day, whether Republican or Imperial, have been accustomed to give the voting paper to the voter before he enters the booth. The third condition of the Bill of last year is also contained in the present measure—namely, that the voter shall not be permitted to put any mark on his voting paper except that which is sufficient for him to show for whom he has voted. The vote will, therefore, be cancelled and void if the voter signs his name or takes any steps in respect of his voting to prove that he is the person who has given that vote. Having stated what are the objects of the Ballot and the stipulations necessary to secure them, I must now mention that there are three dangers for which I at once admit the Ballot system is obnoxious, and against which we have to guard. The first of those dangers is that the voting papers may be tampered with by the officials having charge of the election, or by persons of influence who might by some means get hold of them; the second is the possibility of the voting papers being forged; and the third is the danger—which I do not myself apprehend, but which I know is feared by some hon. Members, and which we must guard against as much as possible—of the possible increase in personation, arising from the supposition that personation may be easier under the Ballot than under the present system. The first two of these dangers are peculiar to the Ballot, but the third does not apply to it specially. I will deal with the last of these dangers first, because I regard it as being the most important of them. It would be very unjust to charge the Ballot with giving rise to personation. Personation exists under the present system. Many hon. Members know that personation votes have been recorded against them, and there may be others who, in the inward recesses of their own consciences, suspect that personation votes have been recorded in their favour. If we had the most secret of all possible systems of Ballot, without any possibility of identifying the votes afterwards, there would still be nothing to prevent the voter from being followed, if he votes, although it may be impossible to follow the vote. I heard it stated in the course of the election for the London school board that it was quite possible for a man to “vote early and vote often;” but I only wish that any hon. Members who agree with that remark had tried the experiment, because nothing is easier than that the name of each voter as he comes to the poll should be ticked off, by which means an attempt on his part to vote a second time would be at once discovered, when the man would be arrested and punished. Therefore, under the Ballot there is about as much danger of a man voting a second time as there is under the present system, but no more. I suppose that under the present system a reckless man may go from one polling-booth to another and so record his vote twice; but that such a thing should be possible is due to the manner in which the register is kept, and not to the method in which the vote is recorded. Now, let us take the case of a man voting in place of somebody else. I do not think it will be asserted that the Ballot would invent that form of improper voting, which is not unknown under the present system. If the perpetrator of such a fraud is discovered under the Ballot, he can, as under the present system, be arrested and punished. The probability of such a fraud being successful is just as likely under the existing plan as it would be under the Ballot. It has been argued that under the present system the vote could be followed and struck out; whereas under the Ballot the vote must stand, however illegally it may have been given. In order to meet this danger many plans have been devised for having a possible scrutiny. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) in his Bill of last year sought to achieve this object by adopting a system of counterfoils, and I believe that to be the best plan that could be devised for the purpose. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), whose name I cannot refrain from mentioning with honour in connection with the Ballot, suggested that some mark should be made upon the voting paper with invisible ink, which might be rendered visible by chemical means, and thus, as by a recording angel, the iniquity of the voter should be brought before the court. But although I myself prefer the plan of my noble Friend we came to the conclusion that it was not necessary to adopt either of the propositions. In the first place, by adopting either of them we should be taking away very much from the simplicity of the mode of voting; and, secondly, however careful we might be in devising regulations for conducting the arrangements according to the principles of the Ballot, it was felt that if we are to have the Ballot at all we ought to have it complete, so that the voter shall have perfect confidence that his vote will be secret. I have argued the question hitherto upon the assumption that it is desirable we should follow the vote, but I may now ask why we should attempt to follow the vote at all. No advocate of the Ballot proposes to enable this scrutiny to be made or the secrecy of the vote to be violated, except in the case of the voter being found guilty of bribery and the vote being condemned as invalid in due course of law. In neither the Bill of the noble Lord nor in that of the hon. Member for Huddersfield was it proposed that a vote should be struck out until it had been proved to be invalid in a Court of Law—in fact, until the personation had been found out. Therefore, the inducement to detect the particular vote disappears, because the vote must have been detected already before it would be possible to attack it. It would have been necessary that some person should have had a strong suspicion that A had personated B, and that, having that suspicion, he should have brought the matter before a Court of Law, and that the Court of Law should have declared that he had proved his case before any scrutiny could have been made. Thus the motive to follow up and to attack the vote would have been reduced to the very slightest possible. The man who would be inclined to put this machinery in motion would do so in order to unseat his opponent. The object hitherto in presenting an election petition has been to unseat the sitting Member for bribery, or other illegal practice, rather than to obtain a seat by a scrutiny. The cases in which scrutinies have been demanded have been very few indeed. We all know that in a very bad case the expense is so enormous that the parties almost always stop short before they reach the point of a scrutiny. I am, however, very desirous that the result of this Bill should be to diminish rather than to increase personation, and in framing the measure I found an omission in the last Corrupt Practices Act the remedy for which would give a defence against personation much stronger than any possible scrutiny could give. I found that although a man loses his seat for bribing or treating, or attempting to bribe or treat, either personally or by his agents, he does not lose his seat for procuring or attempting to procure personation, but is simply guilty of a misdemeanour. We propose, therefore, to insert a clause placing the attempt at personation on the same ground as treating, and that a candidate who has had recourse to it shall be liable to be unseated. Another argument in favour of following the vote is that, if in a Court of Law it has been proved that a candidate has received a personated vote, it would be unfair for him—especially if the numbers ran close—to have the credit of the vote in the final result. We acknowledge this, and have provided that, where in a case of re-opening the question of the number of votes it is found that a personated vote has been given, a vote shall then be struck off from the total votes of the candidate who, through himself or his agents, has been proved to instigate personation, and at the same time we provide that where an elector tendering his vote finds some one else has voted for him the vote shall be kept aside and under certain circumstances counted for the candidate in whose favour he had intended to vote. This is a legal question somewhat difficult of explanation; but I think hon. Members will find on examination that we have succeeded in framing a measure which will, if passed, render personation much less likely to occur than it is at the present moment. I now come to one or two dangers which are peculiar to the Ballot. The first is that of tampering with the voting papers, and in regard to that we do not propose to make much difference between our measure and that introduced by my noble Friend last year. We propose that when a voting paper has once been put into the ballot-box the box shall not be opened except under such precautions as shall secure the inviolability of the vote. The second danger is much greater, and requires to be more carefully guarded against than that of personation—I allude to the possibility of forged voting papers being used. My noble Friend's Bill guarded against that by his system of counterfoils, and my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) also proposed a plan with the same object; but, as we had decided to do without either counterfoils or invisible ink, it remained for us to consider how we should guard against the danger. I think we have entirely met the case by adopting this simple precaution—the returning officer, as he gives out his paper to each voter, shall impress it with a stamp, the character of which he shall be bound to keep secret, and which shall not be used again until a certain fixed time shall have expired. Then, when the boxes come to be opened, each unstamped voting paper shall be rejected as void. This is a course which will, I think, do away entirely with the danger of forged papers being used. I now come to a change in the second part of the Bill of last year for the prevention of corrupt practices. That, again, is a matter for very few words, the object being rather to supply an unintentional omission in that Bill than to introduce anything new. It was there provided that any candidate who did not include all his election expenses in the returns should be considered to have committed an offence bearing the same consequences as bribery. At the present moment any candidate who pays himself, instead of through his agent, any expense except such as the candidate is allowed to pay by law, or who does not include all the expenses in his return, is adjudged guilty of a misdemeanour; but he does not consequently lose his seat. The Bill of last year provided that this should place him in the same position as if he had committed bribery. On re-consideration of the matter, we thought that it was rather too much to say that because he had made such an omission he should be in the same position as if he had bribed or attempted to bribe; and we now propose that the penalty should be the same as if he had been guilty of treating only—that is, that he should lose his seat. I believe that was the real intention of the clause in the Bill of last year. But while we have weakened the clause in one direction we have strengthened it in another. Last year it was proposed that the clause should apply merely to the omission from the return of expenses it ought to have included, and not to the case of a candidate who with his own hands paid expenses which ought to have passed through the hands of his agent. The clause as now proposed would provide for the case I have just stated, and in that particular it is more stringent than the clause in the Bill introduced by my noble Friend last year. Some few other clauses we have left exactly as they stood last year. One of these is the proposal to prohibit the use of public-houses as committee-rooms during the progress of elections. I should personally have been very glad if we could have gone further and shut public-houses altogether on the day of election ; but upon full consideration we felt that in our proposal to the House we could not go beyond the recommendation of the Committee on this point. We, therefore, think the question may be fairly left to the consideration of the House when it shall have gone into Committee on the Bill. I may add we shall be glad to hear the arguments on both sides of this question, as also on that other point of the employment of paid canvassers. Many hon. Members would like to see the employment of paid canvassers done away with altogether, but the question is one beset with difficulties. An election cannot be conducted without the employment of some paid servants, and as you cannot prevent such servants asking votes for the candidates employing them, they at once become paid canvassers. But, on the other hand, the system of paid canvassing is a bad one ; and I have merely made these remarks in order to throw the question before the House, and open it for consideration and discussion when we get into Committee on the Bill. Another part of the Bill that we leave as it was last year with very little alteration—except that we have applied it to municipal as well as to Parliamentary elections—relates to the getting rid of the old plan of nominating candidates and making the final declaration of the poll. I confess that I had for some time a feeling in favour of keeping up the old system of nomination ; but I have now come to the conclusion that such a system is not in accordance with the necessities of the present time. Those old nominations were a great advantage when voting was very limited, and when candidates in populous places who fancied themselves to be on the side of the people liked to appeal from the electors to the non-electors ; but the Reform Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) has removed that ground for maintaining the ancient system of nomination. We have now very large and extensive constituencies which really represent the feeling of the country, and the time has gone by when in the large towns candidates had to commence their addresses—“Electors and Non-electors.” I own I am sometimes at a loss whether I shall or shall not say “Ladies and Gentlemen ;” but I have entirely dropped

the old formula, and commence my speeches with the simple word “Electors.” Our aim ought certainly to be to make an election as simple a proceeding as possible, and to enable every elector desiring to do his duty to do so ; but I cannot help thinking that the old noisy open-air nominations had a tendency to frighten quiet people away rather than to attract them to the hustings. If my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ripon (Sir Henry Storks) were in his place he would be able to show to the House what is, I hope, the last stone thrown in the course of a contested election. The missile was aimed at my right hon. Friend on the hustings at Ripon on the occasion of the recent declaration of the poll there, and he, with that extraordinary adroitness which he has shown on more fields than one, caught the stone, and has preserved it as a memento of the occasion. It is a somewhat curious fact that although nominations and declarations of polls in Yorkshire have always been very noisy, there is no part of the kingdom in which public meetings are more orderly. This fact seems to me to prove clearly that it is unnecessary to maintain the old system in order that candidates may have opportunities of stating their political views. Few hon. Gentlemen, probably, have had greater experience of election meetings than I have. When I stood for the borough of Leeds, and was defeated, I held 30 public meetings, and when I stood with my present Colleague for Bradford (Mr. Miall) at the last election, I held a similar number, but though some of the meetings I have attended have been favourable and others unfavourable to me, in no case have I found any difficulty in obtaining an orderly and attentive hearing while I have argued political questions on which there existed much difference of opinion. I have never found that argument was possible at a nomination. We propose that the nomination shall be perfectly public, and that there shall be ample opportunity given for bringing forward the candidates in public. But I need not say that on this matter, and on all other matters, the Government will be very glad to have the assistance of the Committee, when we get into Committee. I come now to one other change, which is a matter of some importance, and that is the question of the expenses of an election. I mean the legal expenses, and, when I speak of legal expenses, I draw a line between absolute compulsory expenses, if I may so call them, and expenses that are permitted. When I talk of legal expenses, I mean the expenses which the law imposes, not what the law permits—the expenses of the returning officer. When we turn to that question we find rather a curious fact, and that is that the election for Members of Parliament is the only election in the country in which the expenses of the returning officer are not paid by the constituency. I believe I may safely go further, and say that it is the only election for any representative body in the world to which that exception is applied. I have not been able to find any other case in our Colonies or in any other nation where the expenses of the returning officer are not borne by the constituency. The Government have come to the conclusion that these expenses ought no longer to be imposed upon the candidate; and we have come to that determination upon two grounds—first, that it is wrong in principle that they should be imposed; and, secondly, that the system works badly in practice. I think we shall almost all acknowledge that it is wrong in principle. Surely if there be any expense connected with the election of a Member of Parliament, that expense ought to be borne by a constituency or a district. What right has the State to pick out individuals and say they should bear the expense rather than the district which it is absolutely necessary to represent in Parliament? The present system, in my opinion, puts the Member and those he represents in a false position from the very beginning. You have no right to say that the beginning of the relations between himself and his constituency should be a pecuniary favour which he bestows upon them by taking upon himself the expenses of performing their duty. It may be said that in England we are not generally guided by the consideration of purely logical principles, though we shall find that, if there be a decided logical fault in any arrangement it will show itself, more or less, first or last. I do not dwell much on this question as one of principle, although I think it is of importance in that respect, but because I think it works very badly in practice, and especially badly under the present circumstances, when we have so largely increased the area of the constituencies. The very term “returning officer” seems to show that you mean by that an officer appointed by a district; otherwise, if you meant it to be the candidate’s servant, appointed by the candidate, you would call him the candidate’s officer. However, leaving that question, we will see how the matter works. At this moment we find a great number of persons throughout the country complaining against the working of the system. Many of them are men who call themselves the working-men candidates. I say they call themselves so, because I very much object to the term. I think it is a term that we have rather persuaded men to use. I think that in this House and throughout the country we have talked too much of working men being a special political class. The great argument in favour of the Reform Bill was that we took from them all ground of calling themselves a special political class by admitting all householders throughout the kingdom to a share of the franchise. I say it is unwise in us to call them a special class, and no individuals among them have any right to step forward and say that they specially represent the working classes, or that they are specially the working-man’s candidates. On account of the enormous numbers of the working men this is more absurd than it would be for a few individuals in the middle classes to step forward and say they are the representatives of the middle classes. Any man would be thought purely ridiculous if he did so. But still the persons who choose to call themselves working-men’s candidates, and who are entitled to a good deal of influence, find the present regulation standing in the way of their representing their fellow working men. There are many men throughout the country who wish to get into Parliament, whom their friends wish to get into Parliament, and whom we wish to see in Parliament, but who, on account of their circumstances, find this regulation a great difficulty in the way of their attaining their object. It is none the less important because many of them do not represent, any more than persons in other classes, those of the working classes who have taken a special part in politics; and I think it is highly important that we should throw no obstacle in their way, nor in the way of any persons stepping forward to take their part in the deliberations of the House. The present faulty system applies to these persons now; it might apply to other persons at a different time. It applies to persons who represent the opinions or the wishes of persons who have not property themselves, but who would desire that their representative should be one of themselves, and who could not naturally be expected to pay the expenses of their election. Take the Trades Union Bill, brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It is a Bill which the Government have framed with the greatest desire that it should be a fair Bill, and meet the just claims of the artisans throughout the country; but we should very much prefer that there should be some active member of trades unions to help us in legislation on the subject of the measure. It would be a great advantage to us if we had such help. I say, without fear of contradiction, that the hustings expenses stand between such men and a seat in this House. These expenses are very heavy in the case of elections for large towns. Looking over the Return of the last election, I find that in England the whole amounted in the year 1868 to £82,812. These are purely hustings expenses. In Scotland the amount was £7,320. But as one or two Returns are incomplete, we may say that in England the expenses were £92,000, being about double the amount for 1865, in consequence, I suppose, of the Reform Bill having largely increased the constituency. The hustings expenses at Manchester were £1,335. Well, a sixth of that is a heavy sum for a man to be obliged to pay to be returned to this House. The hustings expenses in the Tower Hamlets were £1,162. At Bradford, I find my Colleague, myself, and the other gentlemen who were candidates had to pay £811. [An hon. MEMBER: That includes polling-booths.] Polling-booths are part of the necessary expenses of an election. I mean the actual legal expenses without which an election could not be conducted. Well, suppose I had had to run in competition with a working man, I should have felt that he would have been heavily weighted in the contest, and that it would have been a great difficulty for him, in his position, to provide his legal share of the expenses. If, then, we are to act fairly and impartially, we should alter this practice. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) said the rule should be that the ultimate political power should rest with the householders throughout the country, and that there should be no attempt by law to guide the direction of that power; but this practice imposes on all candidates a burden which, although apparently equal, is really most unequal, and, therefore, it is an attempt by law to direct the representation of one class rather than another. I cannot help thinking that when we fully consider what is the principle behind this exception, and how it really works, the House will be of an unanimous opinion with the Government, that the proposed arrangement ought to be carried into effect. I have now gone over the different changes contemplated in the Bill, and I do not know that I need detain the House any longer. But I will make one or two remarks before I sit down. It has been my good fortune, for the short time I have had a seat on this Bench, to have had the conduct of two or three measures which have not excited any party feeling, and on which I have received the support of both sides of the House. I do not hope that I shall be equally fortunate this time; and yet, if seriously considered, hon. Gentlemen opposite may see reason not to treat this as a party measure. I am quite aware that objections may be raised on both sides of the House upon the principle of it, as being contrary to their feeling that an election should be performed with publicity and in accordance with established English practice. That is, no doubt, a prima facie objection. The more, however, hon. Members look into the principle of the measure I feel persuaded they will the sooner come to the conclusion that we have no right to impose a duty upon a man and not give him every protection in the fulfilment of that duty. I merely make allusion to the argument, because, in appealing to hon. Gentlemen opposite, I am quite sure that to some extent they have a feeling which is quite independent of party. If they had not this feeling, which is disappearing every day, I should really challenge their support on Conservative principles. I believe the time has gone past when this Bill can be considered a measure against the Conservative interest. I honestly believe that, at this moment, Conservative policy and Conservative interests may as much claim the protection of the Ballot as any other; and that in fact—it is only human nature that it should be so—we have to guard as much against mob tyranny as against landlord intimidation. That is a matter which I have no doubt will be taken into account on both sides of the House, and it evidently weighed with the able men who constituted the Parliamentary Committee on the subject. But there is another ground on which I would hope for support from the great Conservative party, and, especially, from my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), for it really is merely carrying out the principle of that measure which they passed, and for which we all know we are so much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire. Well, what was the principle of that measure? It was that we should increase the extent of the constituency, and that for the future government of the country we should rely on the people of the country. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) stated, in that concise form which is true eloquence, that he had faith in the feelings and instincts of the people; he had a belief, looking back to the past history of England, that the English were a people not prone to useless change; and he felt—and he had history behind him, more than perhaps many of us like to believe to be the case—that the English people are really a very Conservative people; that they have great attachment to the associations of the past, and a great want of confidence in the promises of the future, and, therefore, a great respect for the powers that be at the moment. I believe the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in having that reliance on the mass of the population. I should be doing him the greatest possible injustice if I supposed for a moment, in relying upon that Conservative feeling and that respect for the institutions and authorities of the country, he put his trust in any illegitimate influence possessed by those of high social position. I do not for a moment believe it. I know the right hon. Gentleman relied on legitimate influence, and let us just see what is the difference between the two. That is illegitimate influence on the part of the landlord when he turns his tenant out for not voting as he desires, or threatens that he will do so. That is illegitimate influence on the part of the customer when he says he will deal no longer with the tradesman who refuses to vote on his side. And that is illegitimate influence when the rich man tries to bribe the poor man. All these are influences which would be enormously increased under the present extended suffrage. No one, I think, will deny it, and my reason for supporting the Ballot is because I believe it the best means of sapping every illegitimate influence. But there are legitimate influences which I hope never to see diminished—the influence of education; the influence of experience; the influence of the right fulfilment of the duties of property; the influence of the man who claims consideration, who asks to be trusted as a servant of his country because his forefathers have deserved well of the State. I refuse to look forward to the time when such influences would be lost. Well, I support the Ballot because I believe it would destroy the illegitimate influences of bribery and intimidation, which are those besetting sins of our Parliamentary system, to remove which we have been vainly struggling for years. I believe the present measure will do what we want, because it will touch the motive that prompts to the commission of these crimes. I ask the support of all sides of the House, because I feel sure all are anxious to destroy illegitimate influence; and also, for the reason that the more you destroy that influence the more you will increase the legitimate influence, because any attempt to use illegitimate influence produces needless irritation and prejudices people against persons who may have the power to intimidate them, though they may rarely or never have practised intimidation. Why is the Ballot so eagerly desired by vast numbers of voters? I have sometimes seen it said by writers in the public Press that the cry of the Ballot is a factitious cry. That is a great mistake. There is no question which has been more seriously considered or more eagerly desired by a large class. And why? Because they believe that the Ballot would be a blow to bribery and intimidation; because it would take away the motive to bribe and intimidate, and even the power to do so. You may depend upon it that it is not by keeping the power to bribe a man to vote against his opinions, or the power to force him to do so, but rather by relying upon his free will to give them his support, that men of property, intelligence, and social distinction can hope to keep that political influence which they now possess. I beg to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I must congratulate the Government upon their improved attitude with regard to this question. I accept the early introduction of this measure and the fact that it has been placed in the hands of my right hon. Friend as evidences that we are at last about to proceed to a legislative issue. And, Sir, this improvement in the attitude of the Government is attended by an improvement equally marked in the character of their Bill. When the noble Marquess introduced his Bill last year, I ventured to point out what appeared to me two very serious defects. Although that measure purported to be the ripe fruit of the wisdom of a Committee appointed at the instance of the Government—

yet, so far as municipal elections were concerned, that Bill provided no further guarantees whatever. And because it failed to provide those guarantees, it robbed the Parliamentary Ballot which it did provide of nearly half its value; for the only true way of looking at Parliamentary and municipal elections is that they are both merely incidents in the same prolonged and interminable political contest; and the only true view to take of the Parliamentary in relation to the municipal body is that they are Siamese twins, with a common life and a common liability to disease. If, therefore, you check bribery at the Parliamentary election, but leave it unchecked at the municipal election, you may be quite sure that corruption will flow back from the municipal into every vein and artery of the Parliamentary body. But the Bill of my right hon. Friend excels that of the noble Marquess in another respect. The Bill of last year contained provisions for a scrutiny, and the identification of votes was secured by a system of numbers and counterfoils, together with a code of rules, upon the minute observance of which the secrecy of the whole plan depended; but the minute observance of which nobody expected to see. That Bill, therefore, left quite a loop-hole for the discovery of the votes by candidates' agents; and, so far as candidates' agents are concerned, the Ballot should have none, for we may be quite sure that these unscrupulous and ingenious gentlemen will leave no stone unturned before they surrender the hold which they at present possess over the votes and consciences of so many of their fellow-subjects. And with what confidence will men, awed by intimidation, exercise the franchise, when they know that among a hundred chances there is one, at least, that their votes may be discovered and their ruin follow? Indeed, I was so deeply impressed by this consideration, that I should never have ventured to have introduced provisions for a scrutiny into the Bill which I had myself the honour to bring in, if I had not felt sure that I was in a position to recommend machinery which would render every valid vote impenetrable. And in combining an absolutely close Ballot, so far as every valid vote was concerned, with the power of scrutiny in the case of every invalid one, I flattered myself that I had really solved what has always been regarded as the knot of the Ballot question. My right hon. Friend has approached that knot like a conqueror in quite another field. He has cut, he has not solved it. His Bill is not merely a Bill for the introduction of vote by Ballot, but for the abolition of scrutiny; and I congratulate my right hon. Friend upon the courage with which he thus confronts, in place of evading, the stringent arguments which can be brought against the Ballot itself. Of course, in dealing with a question of this character, the Government possesses advantages over a private Member. A private Member would feel, as I felt, that he was bound, if possible, to cover the whole ground; to attempt nothing more than appeared upon the face of the Bill; to leave all existing guarantees for purity of election untouched; but my right hon. Friend, with a strong Government at his back, is able by the same Bill not only to make changes in the mode of taking votes, but a great and sweeping change in the law of elections. I sincerely hope that my right hon. Friend by following this course has not endangered his measure, either here or "elsewhere;" but it would be idle to ignore the fact that there are hon. Members in this House who sat upon the Committee on Elections, and who are therefore able, from their knowledge of the evidence, to bring to bear upon my right hon. Friend's advance in this particular direction a very formidable artillery. Be this as it may, in any such attack they will receive no support from me; and on my own behalf and that of those who have acted with me in the advocacy of the Ballot I must offer my right hon. Friend our sincere thanks for having brought in so complete a measure, and the assurance of our cordial and unreserved support.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman who had introduced the measure that any remark which he might make he should make in no party spirit. After a long Parliamentary career he was one of the unfortunate persons who belonged to no party; and he must add that the reason why he occupied that position was that there had been on both sides of the House a total want of principle in their proceedings. He must venture to compliment the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the measure for the candour and clearness with which he had performed his task. But he could not compliment him upon his humanity, for a more unkind remark than that which he had made and directed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) he (Mr. Bentinck) had never heard during the whole course of his career in that House. The right hon. Gentleman began by talking of "the principle" of the Reform Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. Now, that was the first time he (Mr. Bentinck) had ever heard the word "principle" applied in connection with that measure. But the right hon. Gentleman went further—he, a distinguished member of the great Liberal party, had actually thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire for the enormous boon he had given in his Reform Bill to the Liberal party. He (Mr. Bentinck) had ever entertained namely, that it was one of the most Radical measures that had ever been brought before the House. He did not expect, however, to hear publicly so gracious a recognition of its character from so distinguished a Member as the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House. With all the candour of the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill, he had not been quite fair on one point. Hon. Members opposite were fond of harping on what they called landlord influence, and the right hon. Gentleman said one of the advantages of the Bill would be to destroy landlord influence. He did not mean for a moment to deny that in some places the influence of landlords had made itself felt; but he would venture to say that an undue influence had been quite as liberally applied by the political friends of those on the one side of the House as upon the other. In the next place, though the effect of the measure of the right hon. Gentleman might be to do away with mob influence—a result at which he would rejoice—he appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite to say whether there was not also too often exercised at elections the influence of the great employers of labour. If they were rightly informed no class of men exercised greater influence at Parliamentary elections than the great employers of labour. ["Hear, hear!"] Then, why were they to be told publicly that no persons exercised undue influence at elections except landlords? Let all stand on the same footing. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of three dangers he wished to provide against—namely, tampering with the voters, bribery, and personation; but he failed to show how those dangers would be averted by his Bill. The right hon. Gentleman flattered himself that he would secure complete secrecy of voting by his measure. Now, if he had taken the trouble to study the history of this question of Ballot voting on the other side of the Atlantic or in any other country where it was adopted he would find that it had utterly failed in securing any secrecy whatever. And it was impossible by any exercise of human ingenuity or human legislation, to arrive at a system of complete secrecy in respect to voting. It was an impossibility for two reasons—first, it was impossible to prevent those persons who were anxious to have their mode of voting known making it public; next, he would undertake to say that by far the larger portion of the population, in spite of this Bill, were determined at all times to make their votes public. In reference to bribery, he (Mr. Bentinck) would remind the House of a statement made on one occasion, when the late lamented Mr. H. Berkeley brought forward his annual Ballot Bill—that boroughs would be put up at a price, like articles in a shop-window. He quoted that statement in the House, and in the Division he went into the “No” Lobby with a noble Earl, then one of the chief leaders of the Liberal party, and now no longer a Member of that House. The noble Earl acknowledged that what he had said was perfectly correct, and that under the Ballot the buying of boroughs would be perfectly easy to carry out. He, for one, believed it to be impossible to deal with bribery under the Ballot, and the best description which could be given to any such measure as that now introduced would therefore be “a Bill to render impossible the detection of bribery.” He demurred to the assertion that the Ballot was ardently desired throughout the country, and he undertook to say that if they would put this question of the Ballot to this honourable House by means of the Ballot it would be rejected by a large majority. The Ballot might be desired in large towns, where there was a dread of intimidation, and where intimidation was practised with impunity; but he believed that it was disliked in small towns, and was detested by the larger proportion of the population in the country. He would venture to say that if they were to test the question whether the people of England were or were not in favour of the Ballot by means of the Ballot itself there would be found a large majority against it. How did they mean to treat this question so far as regarded the unrepresented portion of the people—namely, the rural population? He was convinced that the Ballot was most unpopular with those large classes. They would reject the principle, and would not condescend to adopt it. He should like to know how the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with it in reference to constituencies where the majorities rejected the Ballot. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman was introducing a measure that was most unpopular to the great masses of the country and to those residing in the rural districts, and that the only effect of it would be to prevent the discovery of bribery.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN begged to offer to the right hon. Gentleman his warmest support in the progress of his measure through the House. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bentinck) had stated that such a measure was against the wish of the country. That might be a matter of fact or of opinion. As far as his (Sir Dominic Corrigan's) experience went, he should confidently assert that the majority of the people was in favour of the Ballot. In regard to the question put by the hon. Gentleman as to how far the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with the unrepresented portion of the population, it appeared to him (Sir Dominic Corrigan) time enough to deal with their opinions upon the Ballot when they possessed votes. It had been said that the Ballot ought not to have been introduced because the vote was a public trust and the country should know how that trust was exercised. That objection raised the question, what was the tribunal that was to determine whether the voter had given his vote honestly or dishonestly? They should have two tribunals to decide this point so long as they had two great political parties in the State. And he hoped that they should never see the country without those two parties, because otherwise there would be a monopoly in politics, which he thought would be as injurious to the general interests of the country as was a monopoly in trade injurious to the commercial world. Well, then, to which tribunal was a person to be made amenable as to the proper exercise of his trust? Was it to be the tribunal established by the minority or the majority in that House? He had had the gratification of being in both positions. He had joined the minority because he thought with them, and he had been found with the majority because they thought with him. It was obvious under such circumstances that no tribunal was competent to decide such a question but that of a man's own reason, conviction, and conscience. The next argument adduced against this measure was that phrase which they had heard so often—namely, that the Ballot was un-English. When the meaning of the phrase “un-English" was asked, it would be found that no definite signification was attached to the term. There was a time when it was considered un-English to smoke, and the occupier of the Throne condescended to reproach those who approached him with the smell of smoke. Not long since it was considered very un-English—and, for the matter of that, un-Irish, too—to have an election unaccompanied by a shower of paving-stones and brickbats. He hoped the last hustings reminiscences of this kind would be deposited in the British Museum—he believed it was a piece of limestone, which had been adroitly seized by an hon. and gallant Member (Sir Henry Storks) who had not long since come into that House. It was not very long since a number of gentlemen had united in a well-known borough to form themselves into a joint-stock company for the purpose of returning certain Members. It was not very long since an election would have been considered un-English which had not been characterized by bribery. And he trusted that before long the practice of promoting men in the Army by purchase, instead of by merit, would be un-English too. The abolition of the nomination was a feature in the Bill which he cordially approved. In the charges for his election was a heavy item, which, without breach of confidence, he might, perhaps, inform the House he had paid. That item was "to obtain a hearing;" but the men who attended for that purpose believed they would best attain that object by preventing his opponent from being heard. His opponent's friends did exactly the same thing, and the natural result was that neither could procure a hearing. He contended that the nomination was a curse to the town in which the election was held; and that it led to drunkenness, idleness, violence, and immorality. The question was one that ought to be dealt with irrespective of party considerations. He, at all events, in advocating it, did so without pretending to any knowledge of the result. Some urged that it would lead to the increase of sectarian, and others that it would lead to the increase of democratic influence. That might be the case or it might not. In his own country he believed the tendency of the Ballot might be as much to aid the landlords as in any other direction. In many of the agricultural districts there was a strong tendency to almost feudal attachment, and with the political views which he himself entertained, if he were to consult merely his own selfish interests, these might lead him to oppose the Ballot. But if the result to the country at large were that the people, consulting their own minds and balancing the pros and cons, thought it the wisest course to support a manufacturer in one place, a landlord in another, and their guide in religion in a third, he said let it be so; let their action be the result of reason guided by good sense, and he should be satisfied with the result.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he was very anxious that this question should not be debated as a party measure. He remembered this question being debated many years ago, and in a speech which was delivered by Lord Moncreiff, who held the office of Lord Advocate, he used words to the effect that he did not concur in the opinion that if vote by Ballot were adopted it would prevent intimidation; and he stated that he maintained that a vote at an election was as sacred a trust as a vote in that House, and ought to be exercised for the public; and, further, he did not think that secret voting would prevent bribery. He (Mr. Scourfield) was inclined to think that those observations were not without force.

SIR HENRY HOARE congratulated the Government upon the measure they had introduced, which was a decided advance on the Bill of last year. He regretted, however, that a provision had not been introduced for the abolition of paid canvassers, and said he should propose a clause on the subject in Committee. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman said that, though he could not abolish the opening of public-houses, he would abolish the holding of committee-rooms in public-houses. He approved of the measure, and believed it would not only meet with the acceptance of the Liberal side of the House, but would obtain considerable support from the opposite Benches.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE congratulated his right hon. Friend upon the courteous and considerate manner in which he had introduced this Bill. But he regretted that his right hon. Friend had rolled two Bills into one; and protested against the vexed question of secret voting being mixed up with the question of public-houses and committee-rooms. He had always been an opponent of the Ballot, and he did not like the Ballot now. At the same time, he had taken part in every reasonable proposal from both sides of the House to get rid of the good old English electioneering, with all its concomitants of drunkenness, broken heads, and other amenities of which most of them had some recollection. For scenes such as he himself had witnessed—a large space, for instance, in a manufacturing town crowded with some 10,000 operatives hooting, shouting, and disturbing the tranquillity and good order of the town not only for the day, but with consequences visible for days afterwards—there was nothing in extenuation to be offered, save the existence of some old creeping tradition. But among the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman had advanced in favour of the Ballot he seemed totally to have lost sight of the element of human nature; until he could cut out of the human frame that unruly member the tongue he never would succeed in making voting secret. Nor could he hope to get rid of intimidation. All the accounts received from the United States, where probably the most gigantic system of secret voting in the world existed, concurred in saying that a man was hustled, mobbed, and buffeted if he did not go to the poll with his ticket in his hat. There were persons who believed that the same thing could not happen in this country; but the attorney mind in England, he believed, was clever enough to devise means of bringing influence to bear wherever the occasion arose. The severe punishment threatened against personation might very possibly defeat the object which the right hon. Gentleman had in view. In any case it would be impossible to expose and punish personation without breaking in upon the principle of absolute secrecy—the very proposal for striking off a vote for each man convicted of personating involved its being proved on which side the man had personated, and where would then be the secrecy? While admitting that the Bill had many excellent points, he regretted that the subject of secret voting had not been submitted to the House for separate discussion on its own merits.

MR. JAMES hoped that he might be allowed to say a few words in welcome of the Bill, and congratulated the Government that they had introduced a complete and perfect measure on the subject. Last year the Committee that had sat on the subject had felt it necessary to introduce the proviso of the scrutiny; but he rejoiced that the Government had had the courage to throw over that point, and they now were to have the Ballot without the scrutiny. In 1867 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had suggested that when a candidate was proved to have received votes through bribery the election should be held to have passed to the other candidate, however few votes he might have polled. That principle was, however, one capable of dangerous extension, and he thought that the present proposal, which only struck off the number of votes actually obtained by illicit means, was much preferable.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, if the Committee should decide that cards were preferable to voting papers he should have no objection to give effect to their decision. The Bill contained sufficient safeguards against the "Tasmanian dodge," and likewise provided against forged voting papers and tampering with the votes. The opportunities of personation would be less frequent than at present. As regards public-houses, he thought he had already stated that electioneering meetings would not in future be allowed to be held in them, unless the candidate was present. There was great cogency in the argument against paid canvassers; but, at the same time, there was great difficulty in framing an enactment against them. It was a question, however, which he should be glad to have fully discussed in Committee. With respect to personation, he might remark that the Bill made no attempt to keep secret the fact of a man having voted; but its object was to prevent anyone from being able to prove how he had voted.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Laws relating to procedure at Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Mr. Secretary BRUCE, and the Marquess of HARTINGTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 45.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Ten o'clock.

ECCLESIASTICAL DILAPIDATIONS BILL.

(NO. 2.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he would not have troubled the House with any observations on this Bill, but for some remarks made by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Romilly) last night, calculated to produce an impression which it was very desirable to remove. The noble and learned Lord complained of the haste with which this measure and two other Bills were hurried through the House last Session, and apprehended great peril to the Church and to the Episcopal element in the House from their being so hastily dealt with. He (the Archbishop of York), however, wished to remark that the subject had been long under public attention. As long ago as 1862, a Bill on this subject was introduced into their Lordships' House at the instance of the Convocation of Canterbury, and was referred to a Select Committee, composed of eminent Members of that House, including Lord St. Leonards. On review of the labours of the Session, the Committee thought it was too late then to proceed with the Bill, and they recommended that it should be printed with a view to excite the attention of those concerned, in the hope of legislation in the following year. Their able Report, however, for reasons unknown to him, remained on the shelves of the Library till 1868, when he (the Archbishop of York) introduced, late in the Session, a Bill prepared by a Committee of Convocation, substantially the same as the present. In 1869, he re-introduced it; but, after passing through the stage of Committee, it was withdrawn; and last year he brought it in precisely the same as the present, which passed through all its stages in their Lordships' House, was sent down to the Commons, was there read the second time on the 19th July, but was withdrawn on the 25th on account of the lateness of the Session. He was therefore surprised to hear it said this matter had been dealt with hastily and inconsiderately. This was not a Bishop's Bill. Prepared by the Lower Houses of Convocation of both Provinces, the Bill emanated from the clergy themselves, and was not a measure which the Bishops sought to impose on them. It introduced, moreover, no novelty in point of law, for the theory at present was, that every clergyman dwelling in a house which was his freehold was bound to leave it to his successor in as good a condition as that in which he received it. This principle it was not proposed to change—the mode of assessing the waste which had occurred between one incumbency and another would be retained; but it would be made more equal, certain, and complete. The chief object which this Bill sought to secure was to obtain as surveyors men eminent in their profession, acting on settled rules, and deciding in an uniform manner. The Select Committee had proposed that they should be appointed by the Bishops; but this was open to objection, and the clergy, being most deeply concerned in the matter, might reasonably claim a voice in it. Election by the whole body of the clergy would lead to canvassing and agitation, and it was thought best to entrust the election to the archdeacons and rural deans, subject to the approval of the Bishop, who, on complaint, would have power to remove the surveyor. If any plan, however, could be suggested more likely to secure the confidence of the clergy, he was not prepared to say that it would not be accepted. The surveyor would act whenever a benefice was sequestrated—for the person who took the profits of the living out of the hands of the clergyman was clearly bound to keep the parsonage in repair—and whenever a benefice was vacant, at which time nobody's rights could be said to be infringed by his having the house put in sufficient repair. Clause 12—which he admitted was, to some extent, an alteration of the existing law, and would probably, therefore, evoke most objection—gave the Bishop no right to interfere in the first instance, but enabled him, on the requisition in writing of the archdeacon, rural dean, or patron, to order a survey. It was surely but right that the patron should be able to interpose if a waste of the freehold was going on, and the archdeacons were entitled to see that the parsonage, as well as the church, was kept in repair. The fees and the expenses of repairs could be borrowed by the clergyman from Queen Anne's Bounty; and any clergyman calling for a survey, and obtaining a certificate, would be free for five years from any liability for dilapidations, to which latter provision great value was attached by the clergy. He should be the last man to promote the measure if it threw any fresh burdens on the parochial clergy; but they themselves, or at least the more prudent among them, were anxious for it, and since 1862 there had hardly been a single Petition against its principle.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Archbishop of York.)

LORD ROMILLY said, he did not intend, after what occurred last night, to move the rejection of the Bill, though he thought it was insufficiently considered last year, and was a measure as objectionable as that discussed yesterday. The Episcopal Bench were departing from their original functions—those relating to doctrine and discipline—by meddling with the financial arrangements of the parochial clergy. They had nothing to do with them. Dilapidations were a matter resting between the incoming and outgoing incumbent; and though they were occasionally irrecoverable, through the insolvent position of the latter, such cases were rare, and it was best to leave the question to the parties concerned. He was of opinion that the same evils might arise in this case as he thought would arise in the case of the Benefices Resignation Bill, and even more strongly; the evil was to place the parochial clergy under the control of the Bishop. A surveyor was to be sent every five years to examine the state of the parish. Under the Bill, the surveyor, though not appointed by the Bishop directly, was appointed at a meeting over which he might preside if he thought proper, or failing him, the archdeacon; and the sanction of the Bishop must be obtained. Now surveyors, as his judicial experience had shown him, were a very expensive class of men. The whole expense of their employment would fall upon the clergyman. It would be necessary to have an inspection by the surveyor from time to time in order to ascertain what repairs were required; the incumbent might then carry them out himself if he pleased; but then a second survey would be required to certify that the repairs had been properly carried out. The whole of this must be borne by the incumbent, and in the aggregate a very heavy burden would be thrown on the parochial clergy. Then not only might the archdeacon complain to the Bishop, but the latter might, under Clause 26, order an inspection of any parsonage of his own accord. [The Archbishop of York explained that that clause applied only to episcopal residences.] In that case, his objection, in that respect, fell to the ground; but he observed that if the repairs thought necessary were resisted by the incumbent, the matter was to be determined as in the nature of a lawsuit by the Bishop, and the expense would certainly be serious. There was, moreover, he thought, a technical objection to the Bill. The Bill would tax a large body of persons, and he did not remember any measure the whole scope of which was the raising of money for certain purposes from a particular class having originated in that House. What view the House of Commons would take of it he did not know, and if their privileges were guarded by the money clauses being struck out when it was sent down to them the very essence of the Bill would disappear.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL said, the noble and learned Lord seemed to have derived his views of the Bill from a pamphlet which had probably reached many of their Lordships, for his noble and learned Friend had used almost in the same order the arguments of the ingenious writer. The author's name had been communicated to him, and he was happy to recognize in him a Gloucestershire incumbent and a very intelligent and sensible man; but he did not believe his arguments would meet with general acceptance among his brother clergymen. It was apparently feared that the Bishops wanted to violate the proper independence of the parochial clergy; but he joined in his most rev. Friend's disclaimer of any desire to interfere with their privacy or welfare, and he did not believe for one moment that in any diocese any sinister design was imputed to the Bill by any of those for whose benefit it was framed. It might, indeed, be objected that though it raised the difficult question as to what dilapidations were, it did not attempt to answer it; but though it confessedly left this difficulty as it found it, the Bill notwithstanding removed the real and practical difficulties connected with the question, by providing an uniform course of proceeding and a consistent treatment of all cases that came under its purview. It was based on the recommendations of the clergy themselves, as expressed in the Convocation of both Provinces, and could hardly be supposed as threatening any injustice to those whom the noble and learned Lord seemed so desirous to protect. The writer of the pamphlet referred to ruri-decanal meetings and to Convocation as packed assemblies, for which he had neither respect nor reverence, and he emphatically stated that he preferred the opinion of laymen. While joining in the writer's respect for the opinion of laymen, he supported the Bill, as one likely to be beneficial to the clergy and to the Church at large.

On Question? agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

JURIES ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

(NO. 21.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its object was to repeal the 22nd section of an Act of last Session, which directed that special jurors should be allowed 21s. and common jurors 10s.

a day for their attendance, to be paid by the parties, and a deposit to be made by them, as might be determined by the rules of Court. This had proved a serious burden to the suitor, rendering it difficult for persons in humble circumstances to obtain justice without first of all paying a heavy fine; for the Judges had found it necessary to require 12 guineas to be deposited on notice of trial being given, and in some cases as much as £25. The deposit in common jury cases, though smaller, was a serious burden. Nor was this the worst of the matter; for this sum had to be deposited whether the case came on for trial or not; and if the cause was not tried, it was found there were no means of refunding the money, so that a fine had been paid from which the parties had derived no advantage. It was therefore thought desirable to repeal the section, and to avoid any ambiguity he should propose in Committee a proviso that payments made anterior to the passing of the Act should not be interfered with.

EARL GREY said, that this was an illustration of that imperfect system of legislation to which he had more than once called attention, and which was daily becoming a more crying evil. That Bills which had passed both Houses should require amendment as soon as Parliament re-assembled was not creditable to either House, and proved the necessity of subjecting measures before they became law to some closer scrutiny than at present. Some machinery ought to be devised by which the practical working of legislation might be more satisfactorily secured.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ADDRESS FOR A PAPER.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE rose, according to Notice, to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for an explanation with regard to a letter from the right hon. W. E. Gladstone, dated Downing Street, 30th November 1870, addressed to F. Dease, Esq., M.P., in reference to the Sovereign Pontiff; also to inquire as to the accuracy of certain despatches said to be addressed by the noble Earl and the late Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to Foreign Governments on the same subject; also a despatch addressed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 16th January 1871, to the Governor of Gibraltar on the same subject; and to move for copies of these documents. The noble Lord said that the absorbing topics of the war abroad and our defences at home had diverted the public interest from all other subjects; but, were this subject passed over, it would be said that the remarkable utterances of the Premier touching the Pope, and the conduct of Her Majesty's Government regarding Italy, had attracted no attention. As he knew that this was far from being the case, and that it was only owing to very clever political manoeuvring that the public voice on the matter had been stifled, he felt it his duty—though he feared the subject was not very attractive to their Lordships—to bring it under their notice, especially as the public voice had only been hushed pending an explanation, promised by the right hon. Gentleman at the meeting of Parliament, but which had not yet been given. Independently of the special difficulties of bringing forward the question on the present occasion, arising from the pre-occupation of the public mind, he had to encounter the ordinary difficulties attaching to the case. Neither of the great parties in Parliament desired to touch it, because, they said, it involved a religious discussion; the real fact being that neither would risk offending the Irish Members, who held the key of the situation. Party interests, in fact, were supreme. Believing this to be the great misfortune of the day, he must proceed regardless of it; but he would specially guard himself from wishing, directly or indirectly, to enter on any religious discussion. Claiming freedom for his own views, he wished every other man to enjoy the same freedom, save when, under the name of religion, he endeavoured to establish an "imperium in imperio." The first protest he ever made was against this system, and his object was now to renew it. The greater part of his life had been spent among a Roman Catholic people; but religion had never interfered between them, except when interested persons had roused religious animosity in order to gain political power. A more amiable and excellent people than his countrymen in the West did not live on the face of the earth till, by the measures of Her Majesty's Government in the last two Sessions, the premium on disaffection and disturbance became too high to be resisted. He would now call their Lordships' attention to three paragraphs in the Premier's letter to Mr. Dease. They ran thus—

"In reply, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government have not during the various changes which have marked the reign of the present Pope interfered, nor have they now proposed to interfere, with the civil government of the city of Rome or the surrounding country. But Her Majesty's Government consider all that relates to the adequate support of the dignity of the Pope and to his personal freedom and independence in the discharge of his spiritual functions to be legitimate matter for their notice. Indeed, without waiting for the occurrence of an actual necessity, they have, during the uncertainties of the last few months, taken upon themselves to make provision which would tend to afford any necessary protection to the person of the Sovereign Pontiff." The noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies (Earl Granville) would probably acknowledge, without his troubling their Lordships by quotations, that despatches to the Governors of Gibraltar and, he believed, Malta, in reply to addresses from Roman Catholics in those islands, had been forwarded nearly identical in terms with this letter—which proved that Mr. Gladstone's letter conveyed the deliberate policy intended to be pursued by the Government, and was not one of those impulsive statements on the part of the Premier which often caused his Colleagues so much inconvenience. In connection with the declaration that the Government had not interfered, and would not interfere, in the civil government of Rome, he must call attention to a letter published in The Times, and dated Florence, December 21, 1870, purporting to contain a summary of despatches published in the Italian Green Book. This letter remarked—

"Another despatch of Senor Cadorna, dated September 27, shows how well the chief of the English Foreign Office understood the situation of affairs in Italy, and how warmly he recommended to the Italian Government to leave alone that unfortunate business of the 'Roma capitale.' The important question being solved by the taking of Rome, though his advice with regard to the transfer of the capital is not accepted, he tries to persuade the Pope not to leave Rome. Mr. Otway, in a conversation he had with Senor Cadorna on the same day, seems to have insisted once more upon the necessity of postponing the transfer, and points out the difficulties the question produces in Ireland."

The correspondent went on to state that the despatches from all the other great Powers showed that they did not wish to interfere with Italy on the subject, and that she was quite free to act as she thought fit. Now, it seemed to him impossible for one Government to have shown more impertinent interference in the affairs of another country than for our Government to press the Italian Government not to allow the people of Italy to realize their long cherished desire of making Rome the seat of their Government, because it was displeasing to the Irish. It was certainly astonishing to what lengths party influences would lead experienced statesmen. Though not reported in the Green Book, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) doubted not that Senor Cadorna informed the English Government that the Italians, reciprocating the kind interest taken by the Irish in their affairs, strongly advised the Government to transfer the seat of government from London to Dublin—a suggestion which the Irish people would like to see carried out. The next two paragraphs said that Her Majesty's Government, without waiting for an actual necessity, had taken upon themselves to afford any necessary protection to the Sovereign Pontiff. It was commonly stated that a ship of war had been waiting at Civita Vecchia to take the Pope to Malta, or perhaps to Ireland. He hoped His Holiness would choose the latter, for, perchance, as St. Patrick drove out reptiles, so Pius IX. might drive out assassins; but it seemed curious that a country, of which at least four-fifths were Protestants, should be so assiduous in its care of the Pope, when Austria, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium, all Roman Catholic countries, stood by quite indifferent. It showed, he feared, that party interests acted more powerfully than religious influences; or was it that Roman Catholic countries had enough Churchmen already, without undertaking to provide an asylum for their Infallible Head? He had not been surprised to read that Archbishop Manning felt hurt at such conduct. Perhaps the Government would tell their Lordships and the public what palace they had prepared, and what provision it was proposed to make "for the adequate support of the dignity" of His Holiness, for assuredly it would be a strange hospitalilty that landed him penniless on the burning rock of Malta or on the damp shores of Ireland. It was still more important to know what provision the Government had made or were making to secure his "independence in the discharge of his spiritual functions," for this was a difficult undertaking. Englishmen were more ready to give their money than to surrender their liberties, yet he feared that independence in the discharge of the Pope's spiritual functions would involve a slight sacrifice of our national liberty. It was no easy matter to define what such independence meant; but he would endeavour to afford an explanation from well-authenticated documents emanating from His Holiness. Liberty of worship, liberty of the Press, liberty of speech, aye, and of conscience must be all repressed. God had conferred on the Pope not only to direct by persuasion but by force those who turned aside; by a canon of the Church the Pope was bound to put such persons to death; no civil law was binding if it differed from the law of the Church. Such were the laws under which the Romans had suffered for centuries. Such were a few of the many blessings involved in that spiritual independence of His Holiness which the Government had undertaken to protect. It did not require any very narrow-minded bigotry to conclude that it was hardly consistent with the Liberal institutions of this country for the Government to guarantee the spiritual independence of the Pope. It must be remembered, too, that the language of the meetings that occurred at the time the letter was written was anything but temperate. The head of the Roman Catholic Church in this country, supported by some members of their Lordships' House, at a meeting at St. James's Hall, stated—

"It was a figment and an illusion to distinguish between politics and religion. Politics were a part of morals; morals were part of religion; the two were indissoluble."

This statement coincided entirely with the Premier's policy. It was commonly stated that the Ultramontane system was effete; yet we saw it actively influencing every important act of the Legislature, for the great measures of the last two Sessions were certainly framed far more to secure power and income to the Roman Catholic clergy than to benefit the people of Ireland. That most exceptional and novel clause in the English Education Bill, giving the cumulative vote, was introduced, moreover, solely to give Roman Catholics an undue influence in the education of this country. That it was undue was best shown by the fact that no Roman Catholics were chosen under the Parliamentary franchise. It was the carrying out of the system recommended some years back by M. de Montalembert to the Roman Catholics—namely, that by taking advantage of party divisions they could gain an undue influence in the State. He would next refer to a very short letter from Mr. Kinnauld to Mr. Gladstone, and a still shorter letter from Mr. Gladstone himself. The first letter was dated January 6—more than a month after the Premier's letter to Mr. Dease, and therefore could not have been written without full time for "accurately understanding the expressions" in Mr. Gladstone's letter. After stating that there was every wish that due consideration should be shown for the religious feelings of the Roman Catholic subjects of Her Majesty, and that every courteous consideration should be shown to the Pope if in distress, Mr. Kinnauld, remarking on the Premier's letter, said it became all British subjects to inquire whether the Papal jurisdiction, the essence of all spiritual tyranny, the deadly foe of all religious and political freedom, was to be made the object of the watchful and fostering care of Her Majesty's Government? and added that such a policy would be the natural and necessary conclusion to be drawn from Mr. Gladstone's expressions. The Premier, by his silence, accepted this as the policy which the Government intended to pursue; but Mr. Kinnauld, getting no reply to his letter for a fortnight, and supposing that the right hon. Gentleman, fearing that the policy thus imputed to his Government might not be acceptable to his constituents, was struggling between his honest convictions and his political interests, took the somewhat peculiar course of replying to his own letter. Accordingly on the 19th January he wrote a reply, in which he interpreted the Premier's expressions as in no wise intended to pledge the Government to do anything to mix itself up in any way with the Pope's spiritual power. The hand was the hand of Esau, but the voice was surely that of Jacob. This was telling the Roman Catholic voters the Government were not "pledged" to interfere for the Pope, but that they were free to do so, and telling the Presbyterian—"We are not likely to have anything to say to the Pope"—a very convenient position, variable as the political situation might require. The correspondence closed with a note from the Premier to Mr. Kinnauld, dated the 19th of January, short, characteristic, and grateful, saying—

"You have accurately understood those expressions in my letter to Mr. Dease to which you refer. With many thanks," &c.

The Premier did not say whether it was in the letter of the 6th or the letter of the 19th that Mr. Kinnauld had accurately understood him. Another important fact proved that the Government intended to carry out the policy indicated in the letter to Mr. Dease. In the Speech from the Throne an event of such world-wide interest as the annexation of Rome was passed over in silence. The Italian antecedents of the Premier made this the more remarkable. The disappointment of the Italians at seeing that the liberal and generous sympathies of so distinguished a statesman must yield and be smothered to meet the exigencies of party would not give them or the other peoples of Europe a high estimate of the working of our constitutional Government. It was also another instance of the wishes of the large majority of the inhabitants of these islands being subordinated to those of the small minority; for at most the Roman Catholics of Great Britain and Ireland did not exceed one-fifth of the population, the vast majority of the remainder entirely sympathizing with the overthrow of the Papal Government and the completion of Italian nationality. Our home and foreign policy was thus regulated principally by the Irish Members returned by the Roman Catholic hierarchy, who held the balance between the two great parties in the State—a result both unfortunate and contrary to the intention of our Constitution. When the evils arising therefrom were seen by the British people, he believed that if Parliament did not find the remedy they would. He would ask his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen to remember that the occupation of Rome was only a part of a great movement which had been successfully carried out by their co-religionists all through Europe—namely, an assertion that while they adhered to their religious faith they would also be freemen, and would not live under an absolute Government, whether carried on by laymen or ecclesiastics. It was principally owing to Roman Catholics abroad having shown this determination that the British people had given up all jealousy as to Roman Catholics in Great Britain having the fullest political privileges; but, if Englishmen saw that the enlightened Roman Catholics united with the ignorant in the endeavour to establish that very Ultramontane system which their co-religionists had thrown off all through Europe, they would be justly regarded not only as enemies to all civil and religious liberty, but as refusing to live on terms of equality and goodwill with the rest of Her Majesty's subjects. With every feeling of goodwill to his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, he would say—"Accept equality; by attempting to gain superiority you will create a revulsion of feeling which will be as much to be regretted as it will be disastrous to your own cause." Apologising for having so long occupied their Lordships' time, and thanking them for their kind indulgence, he had now to ask the noble Earl (Earl Granville) for an explanation of Mr. Gladstone's letter to Mr. Dease, and for the production of the despatches issued from the Foreign and Colonial Offices to which he had referred.

Moved. "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be pleased to direct that there be laid before the House, Copy of a Despatch addressed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 16th January 1871, to the Governor of Gibraltar, on the subject of the occupation of Rome by the Sovereign Pontiff"—(The Lord Ormonde and Browne.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not think the noble Lord has taken a very convenient mode of bringing this question forward. Mr. Gladstone's letter, although an important letter, is not a Parliamentary document: moreover, as your Lordships are probably aware, Mr. Gladstone will be questioned respecting that letter in the House of Commons, and he will, I have no doubt, be able to give an answer satisfactory to all fair and reasonable men. I think, too, the mode pursued by the noble Lord is the less convenient, inasmuch as my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley) has no objection to the production of the despatches relating to the subject, and when those despatches are before your Lordships they will form fit subjects of criticism. For myself, as long as I unworthily hold the Office of Foreign Secretary, I shall consider any subject—whether religious, commercial, or political—worthy the notice of Her Majesty's Government, if it be a subject of legitimate interest to any considerable number of the Queen's subjects. With respect to the second part of the noble Lord's Notice, I believe your Lordships will agree with me that nothing could well be more vague, and less calculated to afford a clue to what the noble Lord was about to say; for the noble Lord asks for "certain despatches," without specifying the date, or stating by whom or to whom they were written: and then he asks whether they are accurate or not. My hon. Friend Mr. Otway, though up to the time of his retirement from Office he took a great interest in Foreign Affairs, would certainly never imagine it to be his duty to address despatches to foreign Governments on any occasion whatever. It turns out, however, that what the noble Lord referred to related to a despatch of the Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, published in the Green Book of that country. These Papers have been presented to your Lordships, and are being printed, and in the course of this week they will be in your Lordships' hands. The following is the correspondence upon the subject:—

"No. 4. Foreign Office, Jan. 3, 1871.

"Sir,—I have received your despatch, No. 378, of the 19th ultimo, enclosing a copy of the Italian Green Book; and I have read the despatch of the Chevalier Cadorna to M. Visconti-Venosta of the 27th of September, 1870, which is published at page 50 in this collection of documents. In that despatch the Italian Minister reports some casual remarks on the question of the transfer of the Italian capital to Rome, which fell from myself and from Mr. Otway on the occasion of two conversations which he had respectively with us. I took occasion yesterday to inform the Chevalier Cadorna that he had attached a greater importance to these observations than had been intended by me or by Mr. Otway. I remember the conversation perfectly which I had the honour of holding with the Chevalier Cadorna, in which I asked him whether he believed the transfer of the capital to Rome would take place, and added that I had been convinced by the arguments of Massimo d'Azeglio, in a pamphlet published a few years ago, that it would be more prudent to continue the seat of government at Florence. I made no allusion to Ireland, or to the effects which the removal of the capital might have upon public opinion in that country, and neither Mr. Otway nor I gave any official opinion on the matter. G.

"To Sir Augustus Paget."

"No. 25. Florence, Jan. 18, 1871.

"My Lord,—I have read to the Chevalier Visconti-Venosta your Lordship's despatch No. 4 of the 3rd inst., in reference to a despatch of Chevalier Cadorna, published in the Italian Green Book, reporting a conversation with your Lordship and Mr. Otway, in which some reference was made to the transfer of the Italian capital to Rome, and when I had concluded, his Excellency said that he had never considered your Lordship's remarks upon this subject as having an official or a formal character, but had understood them as having been uttered in the course of confidential conversation in the sense which you now attribute to them. If he had given the despatch a place among the diplomatic documents laid before the Italian Parliament, it was because he had thought it desirable that it should be seen that even in the mind of a statesman of recognized friendly sentiments towards Italy some doubts existed as to the expediency of the removal of the seat of government from where it was now established to Rome. Monsieur Visconti-Venosta added that the Chevalier Cadorna had informed him of the observations which your Lordship had recently made to him upon his report of the 27th of September. I have the honour to be, with the highest respect, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant, A. PAGET.

"The Earl Granville, K.G., &c."

With regard to the third part of the Question, I have only to add that my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies will immediately produce the despatches on the question.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH said, he rose to enter his protest against the manner in which the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) had brought this question forward. He had commenced his speech by protesting that he wished to avoid the question of religious differences, and yet, notwithstanding this disclaimer, the whole of his arguments were based upon these religious differences. The occupation of Rome was no question as to whether the Roman Catholic or the Protestant religion was the right one, but one which depended on international law and justice, and involved the social rights of millions of her Majesty's subjects. That this was the right view, and as the noble Lord appeared to think that the opinion expressed by Mr. Gladstone and by the Secretary for the Colonies was very unusual, he (the Earl of Denbigh) would quote the opinion of Lord Ellenborough, as expressed on the 12th of June, 1849.

On that occasion Lord Ellenborough said—

"It was quite true that England was not a Catholic State, and might not, therefore, feel that personal interest in the position of the Pope which was felt by Catholic Powers; but we had 8,000,000 of Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and it was as much an object of interest to us as it could be to any one of the Catholic Powers of Europe that the Pope should be in a position of independence; that he should not be so situated as to be dependent upon the bounty or upon the power of any one, or of any combination of the Powers of Europe."—[3 Hansard, cvi. 10.]

That was a statesmanlike view of the subject; and it was shared by Lord Brougham, who, speaking on the 20th of July, said—

"My opinion is that it will not do to say that the Pope is all very well as a spiritual Prince, but we ought not to restore his temporal Power. That is a shortsighted, and I think a somewhat superficial view of the case. I do not believe it possible that the Pope could exercise beneficially his spiritual functions if he had no temporal power. For what would be the consequence? He would be stripped of all his authority. We are not now in the eighth century, when the Pope contrived to exist without much secular authority, or when, as Bishop of Rome, he exercised very extensive spiritual power without corresponding temporal power. The progress of the one, however, went along with that of the other. . . . His temporal force increased his spiritual authority, because it made him more independent. Stripped of that secular dominion he would become the slave now of one Power, then of another. . . . His temporal power is an European question, not a local or religious one, and the Pope's authority should be maintained for the sake of the peace and the interest of Europe."—[3 Hansard, cvii. 627.]

Those extracts were sufficient to show that the great statesmen who uttered them had taken a different view of the subject from that adopted by the noble Lord. The noble Lord had ventured to point out what he believed to be the great dangers in the opinion expressed by the Archbishop of Westminster—that politics and morals could not be separated. He (the Earl of Denbigh) believed that he could explain the meaning of the Archbishop, as he himself shared the same view of the true meaning of politics. Politics were only the social and moral law of individuals applied to communities; and if the noble Lord would accept that definition, he believed he would not see in the statement of the Archbishop the dangers which he now anticipated.

Motion agreed to.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—
THE SIEGE OF PARIS—ABSENCE OF THE ENGLISH CONSUL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I wish to ask my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs a Question upon a subject that has excited a great deal of comment not only in the Press, but in private circles in this country, and which has elicited, I am afraid, some very unfavourable expressions, both in England and abroad, as to the Department of which my noble Friend is the head, and has led to unpleasant reflections upon our national character. The Question I wish to ask him is this—Why the English Consul was absent from his post at Paris during the greatest part of the siege; and if, for a considerable period, the English population were not left there without any British official protection? That Question has been asked in "another place," and the reply returned by my noble Friend's subordinate (Viscount Enfield) was an eminently unsatisfactory one. He said that Lord Lyons was intrusted with discretionary powers, and that he told the Consul to leave Paris, but not to quit France, and to remain within reach. What he meant by remaining within reach when Paris was closely beleaguered I do not understand; as a matter of fact he held no communication with Paris during the siege. He also said that Lord Lyons warned his countrymen of the risk and danger that they incurred by remaining. Mr. Wodehouse remained for a time and then left also. But before I proceed with the case of the Consul, I wish to state openly, as Lord Lyons has been attacked by a right hon. Friend of mine (Sir Robert Peel) in "another place" for having quitted Paris and going to Tours with the French Government, my opinion that he could not have done otherwise, and that he would have acted wrongly if he had remained. His post was one requiring great freedom of action, and it would have been impossible for him to have fulfilled his duties towards his own country if he had remained shut up in Paris during a close siege. Recollect, however, that during all the unparalleled misery of this great siege, lasting four and a half months—for it began in the middle of September and did not close till the end of January—there were no less than 2,000 British subjects starving in Paris; and if ever British subjects required the consolations and assistance of their Government, it was under such awful circumstances. And yet the man whose peculiar duty it was to remain in Paris in the absence of the Ambassador—I express the opinion formed from my own experience at the Foreign Office—and to look after our countrymen, had, as stated by Lord Enfield in "another place," permission to leave Paris during that time. Other persons attached to the Embassy were also allowed to leave; so that no one remained except Mr. Wodehouse, whose business was to take care of the archives of the Embassy. The siege went on, and the miseries increased. I do not wish to harrow the feelings of your Lordships by describing what the sufferings of our countrymen, as well as of the French, have been; but I may say that I received a letter from an old servant of mine in Paris, in which it was stated that she and her husband, upon the 14th of January, had left off eating cats, and dogs, and rats, and were actually reduced for sustenance to eat sausages made out of the entrails of dogs. Tallow candles had long disappeared, having been eaten, and oil also had been consumed for purposes of food; so that light in the houses during the long winter nights was impossible. This was the state of the poorer English in Paris, who found it impossible to follow Lord Lyons' advice, inasmuch as they had not the means of coming over to this country. Perhaps my noble Friend opposite will tell me whether the Government sent out any assistance in the shape of money to those persons to enable them to leave Paris, and whether those who remained did so out of sheer obstinacy or from a false feeling of courage. Quite at the end of December the bombardment began. And I must say, in passing, that, in my opinion, the bombardment of Paris will remain a blot and a stain on the escutcheon of Prussia; for, although, according to the rules of war, Prussia had a complete right to bombard Paris, as a first-class fortified town, yet it is necessity alone which supports the exercise of such rights. The city would have submitted to the moment as soon if there had been no bombardment; and from those in the city we learn that the bombardment rather roused the temper of the French and lengthened the resistance. In the bombardment I believe not more than three military men were killed; but women and children suffered in great numbers, and it is a fact that one shell killed seven children at once. And so deep was the feeling which the event excited when it was proclaimed in Paris that M. Jules Favre actually followed their remains to the grave. When that event occurred, was there any Englishman in Paris to represent this country? Why, not even the military and naval Attachés of the Embassy were there. I suppose they did not leave without the orders to that effect of the noble Earl himself or of Lord Lyons. And what could possibly induce the giving of such orders? To be there at such a time was to be at their proper place and post; it was their raison d'être. Such men are sent out, as I have always understood, to learn everything that relates to foreign armaments, to become acquainted with every new invention, and to watch the performance of every new weapon. Why, it was a God-send to these men and the Government who appointed them to have a bombardment going on—they never had such a chance of learning before—and to recall those gentlemen at such a time seems to me a very doubtful proceeding—for I cannot believe that they would have left unless recalled. There can be no more gallant officer, for instance, than Colonel Claremont, who was all through the Crimean War; and I want to know the grounds upon which these two officers were called away from Paris at the very moment when valuable experience could have been obtained, when their services upon the spot could have been of great advantage to this country, and of incalculable value to the miserable English who were suffering in Paris. Thank God! the English were not totally deserted. They were taken care of by three men, whose names will be considered noble as long as the history of the siege is recorded—Mr. Wallace, Mr. Herbert—Lord Carnarvon's brother—and Mr. Blunt, whom my noble Friend afterwards very properly made Consul—and by their means, probably, hundreds were saved from misery and death. The case, however, is one which has led to very severe reflections upon this country. During this great war the acts of this country have been very narrowly watched, and I do not know anything which has made a deeper impression upon the public mind than the belief that something like 1,500 or 2,000 poor English were left without any official assistance in Paris. I beg to ask my noble Friend opposite the Question of which I have given Notice—namely, Why the English Consul was absent from his post at Paris during the greatest part of the siege; and if, for a considerable period, the English population were not left there without any British official protection; and, further, whether Mr. Blunt has been permanently appointed Consul?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am compelled to answer the noble Earl's Question at some length in order to explain to your Lordships what has happened in Paris during this war. In the first place, let me say I cannot go quite so far as the noble Earl in asserting that diplomatic and consular agents are bound to be kept in a besieged city to protect the interests of their fellow-subjects after those fellow-subjects have had every possible warning of the danger of remaining there, and of the difficulty which might attend any attempt to come away at a later period. I feel it right to say this, though it was not the guiding principle of our action as your Lordships will see on referring to the Blue Book. The French demanded that all non-combatants should retire as impeding the defence. On the 14th of September Lord Lyons wrote from Paris—

"In my despatch of the 29th ult. I reported to your Lordship the steps I had taken to call the attention of British subjects to the notice issued by the Acting Prefect of Police recommending all persons not capable of facing the enemy to leave Paris, and in your despatch of the 1st inst. your Lordship informed me that Her Majesty's Government approved of the steps I had thus taken. Further notices of the same kind have been issued by the French authorities, and I have on my part done all in my power to warn British subjects of the dangers to which they expose themselves by remaining in a town threatened with an immediate siege. Large numbers have departed, those who were unable to provide from their own means the expense of the journey having been aided by the British Charitable Fund, to which most liberal contributions have been made by the public in England."—[Franco-German War, No. 1 (1871) No. 130.]

I am happy to say that during the whole of that period we have been able to advance money to be disbursed in one way or other by that charitable committee for the relief of British subjects. Lord Lyons goes on to say—

"Finding, however, that notwithstanding the near approach of the invading army, many still linger, I have thought it right to insert in Galignani's Messenger a notice, in my own name, reminding British subjects that if, after the warnings given them, they remain at Paris, they do so at their own risk and peril, and that if they delay their departure any longer they may not hereafter be able to get away. I have also had copies of the notice printed separately for distribution among British subjects, and I have the honour to transmit some herewith to your Lordship."

I have felt it right to say this much to show the business-like steps which Lord Lyons took to warn British subjects that it was better they should withdraw. With regard to Lord Lyons himself—though my noble Friend entirely refuses to endorse the accusations which had been made against him—I beg to say that those accusations, which have been repeated in many quarters, are absolutely without foundation. At the same time that Lord Lyons is charged with cowardice in having deserted his post, I have received letters complaining of our want of sympathy as a Government in withdrawing the British Ambassador at such a time; whereas the exact contrary was the case. Let me place your Lordships in possession of what really occurred. In a letter written on the 7th of September Lord Lyons relates a conversation which he had had with Prince Metternich, referring to the representations made by Count Beust, in which the great inconvenience, and indeed impropriety, was pointed out of allowing the diplomatic body to be shut up in Paris during the siege and thus deprived of the means of communicating with their respective Governments. Prince Metternich, in consequence, spoke to M. Jules Favre, and represented to him that it was incumbent on the Foreign Minister to give notice to the diplomatic body in time to enable them to leave Paris without undue haste or inconvenience. M. Jules Favre appeared to take the same view. And what was the reply of Lord Lyons?—

"I have said to all, that, in principle, Count Beust's view appears to me just and reasonable; but that, for my own part, I do not desire to hasten my departure from Paris without very good cause. I shall, I have said, be disposed to act in concert with my colleagues in the matter, and shall feel no difficulty about leaving Paris if I am requested or advised to do so by the French Government; but I shall be content to leave the matter as it stands, without making any special representation to the Minister for Foreign Affairs. I should add that it is thought to be probable that some of the Government functionaries, and among them the Minister for Foreign Affairs, may determine upon removing from Paris. In this case, the diplomatic body would naturally follow the Minister through whom they communicate with the Government."—[No. 84.]

I am sure my noble Friend will see that, in cases of very exceptional difficulty, it is wise for a Government not to fetter a man too much, but to leave him with considerable discretion as to the course he should pursue. On the 19th of September, Lord Lyons wrote to me as follows:—

"Prince Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, came to me at Paris on the 17th inst., and told me that the Comte de Chaudordy, the head of the Cabinet of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, had brought him a message from M. Jules Favre which made him think that it would be desirable that the Representatives of the principal European Powers should leave Paris at once, in order not to be cut off from communication with their Governments. M. de Chaudordy had, the Prince said, informed him that the French Government expected from one moment to another to hear that the enemy had rendered the only railroad still open (the Western) impassable; and that, this being the case, M. Jules Favre, knowing that Prince Metternich was particularly anxious not to have his communication with his Government interrupted, had thought it courteous to warn him that the danger of this occurring appeared to be imminent, and that, in fact, it would be prudent for him to leave Paris the following day at latest. I told Prince Metternich that I had, personally, a great disinclination to leave Paris just then; but that, nevertheless, I should, of course, do so if it appeared that I should be more useful elsewhere; and I added that I should certainly be unwilling to act in the matter in a different way from my principal colleagues. I must, however (I said in conclusion), see M. Jules Favre before I come to any decision."—[No. 147.]

Lord Lyons accordingly went to M. Jules Favre, and related to him what had passed between Prince Metternich and himself. His Lordship said—

"M. Jules Favre answered that his message to Prince Metternich was specially intended for the Prince himself, who had expressed to him a very marked dislike to the prospect of being hemmed in by the Prussian troops. Nevertheless he thought it only right that other Representatives of foreign Powers should know that the French Government was no longer in a position to secure their communications with the world outside Paris."

M. Jules Favre then suggested that his Lordship should go to Tours. Lord Lyons replied as follows:—

"I said that I still disliked the idea of leaving Paris just yet, but that, of course, I should not hesitate to proceed to any place in which I could have a better prospect of being useful; and that after what he had said, if I found that my principal colleagues thought it advisable that we should go off to Tours in the evening, I would no longer be an obstacle to their departure. The result has been, as your Lordship is already aware, that the Austrian Ambassador, Prince Metternich; the Ottoman Ambassador, Djemil Pacha; the Italian Minister, Chevalier Nigra; the Russian Chargé d'Affaires, M. Okouneff; and I, left Paris the night before last, and arrived here yesterday. Colonel Claremont considered that, in a military point of view, Paris was the point of most interest accessible to him; and, as I concurred with him in this view, I sanctioned his remaining there. At the time I left Paris Captain Iloré was too unwell to move. I left a memorandum recommending that, if able to do so, he should leave Paris as soon as he should be well enough to travel; and that if his health should not be quite re-established, he should go to England to recruit it; otherwise, that he should join me here, where he would find the Minister of Marine, and would consequently be at the main source of naval information. Finding that a not inconsiderable number of British subjects still remained in Paris, notwithstanding my repeated warnings of the risk they might incur by so doing, and of the probability that when the danger was actually present they might not be able to get away. I have left Mr. Wodehouse at the Embassy to give them advice, and, if possible, protection. I have, moreover, placed the Embassy-house, and the Government property belonging to it, in Mr. Wodehouse's charge; and I have desired him to take advantage of any opportunities he may have of sending direct to your Lordship, as well as to me, information of public interest. A few hours before I left Paris, I presented him to M. Jules Favre, who readily agreed to send and receive communications through him. Lastly, I have ordered Mr. Wodehouse to come away from Paris if the place should be threatened with immediate bombardment or other imminent danger, and have directed him, in this contingency, to do his utmost to obtain a safe passage out of Paris for all British subjects."

Now, it appears to me that, as these instructions were given, I was quite right in approving what Lord Lyons had done. I am exceedingly glad that he did leave Paris, and that he, as the holder of the dignified rank of Ambassador, went not only to Tours but also to Bordeaux; thus enabling us to say that although we could not officially recognize the existing Government, yet for all practical and business purposes our relations with it were close and intimate. I have no doubt, too, that Lord Lyons outside Paris has accomplished many things he could not have done inside the city. Lord Lyons left in Paris Mr. Wodehouse and Colonel Claremont, as he thought it would be advantageous for them to remain there with his sanction and that of the Foreign Office. Afterwards, in view of Count Bismarck's declaration, that military considerations would compel him to put a stop to all further communication with persons inside the city, Lord Lyons sent me word that he felt some anxiety with respect to the servants of the Embassy and the other British subjects who had not quitted Paris. Upon this I wrote to Count Bernstorff to obtain permission for those persons to pass through the German lines; and this leave was granted by Count Bismarck, on condition, however, that a nominal list should be furnished of the persons who desired to come out. On the other hand, the French authorities were exceedingly unwilling to let a large number of persons pass out. A month elapsed before Mr. Wodehouse left Paris, and when he did he had not quite completed his list, although he had taken every means in his power to give the requisite notice to all British subjects. He was continuing to make up the list till 12 o'clock of the day when he went away. About 126 persons accompanied him, and the hardships they had to undergo were so severe that it is doubtful whether they had not better have remained in Paris. At that time we were not aware that such a large number had remained, although we had always supposed that there were some English domestic servants, workmen, and others, who did not wish to leave Paris because they had formed connections there, while some had great difficulty in getting away on account of their poverty. With regard to the latter, I may remark that very great assistance was rendered to them by the Charitable Commission to which the Government and many charitable persons had contributed. When Mr. Wodehouse left, the Consul's clerk came away. Mr. Wodehouse was at first unwilling to allow him to come away; but on that gentleman representing that for a considerable time no application had been made to him in respect of Consular duties and the legal advisers of the Embassy having given their opinion that he would not, under the circumstances have any power there, Mr. Wodehouse included his name in the list. Colonel Claremont, however, for the reasons which had actuated him in the first instance, acting in accordance with instructions received from Lord Lyons, remained in Paris; but about the second week in December the Colonel, finding that the only other military attaché in Paris was about to leave, came away with that gentleman in obedience to orders received. The noble Earl seems to think that it was a happy circumstance for Colonel Claremont to have an opportunity of being bombarded and shelled in a town undergoing that process; but the fact is, that Colonel Claremont would not have acquired much military information if he had remained longer in Paris, because there was great jealousy shown in regard to letting strangers go to the front lines, and, consequently, military information was more difficult to procure during the bombardment than it would have been at the head quarters of the army in an open campaign. I cannot therefore regret the course taken by Colonel Claremont. When Colonel Claremont came out, the French authorities had resolved not to let any other person leave the city. We afterwards ascertained, however, by indirect means, that a great many Englishmen and women were suffering very much indeed, as has been described by the noble Earl, and I have already acknowledged in my despatches the aid which was given by Messrs. Wallace, Herbert, and Blount to their poor fellow-countrymen. About £42,000 was expended in giving this relief. I may add that Mr. Clark, a clergyman, also devoted himself to the work in a most remarkable way. Immediately upon hearing this we endeavoured to get our Consul in; but at that time matters had gone so far that permission to enter Paris was positively refused to everybody. We did our best to meet the difficulty by communicating with Mr. Odo Russell. From the statement of facts I have made I hope your Lordships will conclude that there has not been any neglect, but that some of the inconveniences experienced have arisen from unparalleled circumstances, against which it was impossible to provide at the beginning.

QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Anglo-American Commissioners have Instructions to discuss with the American Government the advisability of England and America, as the two great Maritime Powers, co-operating to effect such changes in Maritime International Law as may minimize the risk of collision between neutrals and belligerents?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, if this were a question relating exclusively to the Instructions of the Commissioners, and the subject were one that had never been opened before, I think I should ask my hon. Friend to excuse me from answering him, because I do not think it desirable that the topics of their Instructions should be brought out one by one before the public of this country. Whatever is done in that respect had better be done deliberately and of set purpose, and with the consent of the two countries by an understanding together. But, in truth, this was a subject that was mooted very long before the Commission sat, and that has been discussed between the Representatives of both countries at various periods during the last two years — indeed, during a considerable number of years, and ever since a certain stage of the great Civil War in America. And I may say to my hon. Friend that I shall be very much disappointed, as well as very much surprised, if any settlement that may be come to by the two countries does not include the consideration of those improvements which it may be found practicable to introduce into maritime international law.

Afterwards—

MR. MUNTZ asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Sir John Rose, who was reported to have been one of Her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to adjust all claims between Great Britain and the United States of America has resigned or been recalled; and, if so, why?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, it was the intention and wish of the Government that Sir John Rose should be one of the Commissioners; but for reasons, he believed, of an entirely private and personal nature, Sir John Rose felt himself unable to accept that position.

IRELAND—TRAMWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. SYNAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he intends bringing in a Bill this Session to amend the Irish Tramway Acts, or a Bill to extend to Ireland the Tramway Act of last Session, with the necessary modifications?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that he thought there had not yet been sufficient time to test the working of the English Tramway Act passed last Session, and he did not propose to introduce any measure of that kind for Ireland this Session.

RATING OF MINES.—QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether Mines would be made liable to the Poor or other Local Rates by the Government measure dealing with Rates?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not think him wanting in courtesy if he asked him to allow him to defer answering that Question at present. The Government were anxious to submit their proposals on local rating as a whole to the House, and he hoped he should not be pressed to anticipate any part of his general statement.

ARMY—WAGES OF SOLDIERS.

QUESTION.

MR. DICKINSON asked the Secretary of State for War, What is the estimated equivalent weekly wage of a private soldier in the Royal Horse Artillery, the Life and Horse Guards, the Cavalry of the Line, the Royal Engineers, the Foot Guards, and the Infantry, including provisions, clothing, &c.?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that a detailed statement in answer to his hon. Friend's Question was in preparation, and if he would be so good as to move for it it would be laid on the Table.

PRISON LABOUR.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he intends to take any steps to mitigate the distress existing among the mat makers by reason of the employment of steam power in Wakefield Prison in such manufacture?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had no power to take any such steps as were indicated in the Question; but he presumed the object of the hon. and gallant Member was to obtain the opinion of the Government as to whether it was advisable to continue the use of steam power for that purpose in Wakefield Prison. The subject of prison labour was one not only of great interest, but great difficulty, and now excited much difference of opinion not in this country only, but in the United States of America. It was urged by some that prisoners ought not to be employed on work that came into competition with free labour. Now, the prison regulations were these—If a prisoner was sentenced to three months' imprisonment the hard labour he underwent was generally of an unremunerative kind, being confined to the treadwheel, shot drill, and the like; but if his term of punishment exceeded three months, the remainder over that period of it might be, and usually was, spent on remunerative labour, for the double purpose of relieving the rates and of accustoming the prisoner to employment by which he might when released obtain an honest living. Both of those objects were in themselves good, and unless all remunerative labour in gaols were absolutely prohibited, he did not see how they could deal with the matter in the manner suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Whatever labour of a remunerative kind was performed in prisons must necessarily come into competition with free labour. It was said there were special reasons why these prisoners should not be employed in making mats, because the mat trade was now much depressed and the workpeople engaged in it were in great distress. The answer to that, however, was that the justices of Wakefield asserted that they could not supply the mats as fast as they were asked for, showing that there was considerable activity in the trade. He was not prepared to bring in a Bill on the part of the Government to provide that prisoners in gaols should not be employed in remunerative labour. But the subject was surrounded with difficulty, and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman desired to bring it under the notice of Parliament it would doubtless receive full and fair consideration.

SCOTLAND—GAME LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. FORDYCE asked the Lord Advocate, If it is the intention of Government to propose any measure on the subject of the Game Laws in Scotland during the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE replied, that he was not enabled to speak with greater certainty than this—that his own views on that subject were unchanged, and that he should be glad to introduce a measure on it if, looking at the state of Public Business, there was any fair chance of carrying it this Session.

FRANCE AND GERMANY — THE SIEGE OF PARIS—ABSENCE OF THE ENGLISH CONSUL.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in consequence of the statement made by him “that Lord Lyons, in leaving Paris on the 17th September, acted under the direct injunctions of the Government at home,” and as the Despatch containing these injunctions does not appear in the Blue Book which has been laid before Parliament, the Government have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Despatch of Her Majesty’s Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to Lord Lyons containing these injunctions to quit Paris?

MR. GLADSTONE : Sir, I rather think my right hon. Friend has put on my words a construction somewhat broader than they would naturally appear to carry, if he supposes that we had indicated to Lord Lyons the day on which he was to quit Paris. My intention was to convey to the House that Lord Lyons had acted principally on his own responsibility, but that we were strictly and entirely responsible for what he had done, and that we had supplied him with the rules and the considerations which were to govern him as to remaining in Paris. A reference to those rules is to be found in the Blue Book that has been laid on the Table, in Despatch No. 86, as well as in subsequent Despatches, Nos. 112, 113, and 150. In the first despatch I have mentioned — namely, No. 86, to be found, I think, at page 52, the instruction is given to Lord Lyons as follows:—

“Lord Granville approves of his having hesitated to leave Paris, as he stated in his despatch of the 7th of September, under the circumstances which then existed, and he instructs him in the name of Her Majesty’s Government to concert as much as possible with his Colleagues, but also to remain in Paris as long as possible with the French Government, except in the case of an immediate bombardment.”

The case of an immediate bombardment did not arise, but Lord Lyons did concert with his Colleagues and with the French Government. His Colleagues, or the Representatives of the chief States of Europe, left Paris as he did, I think much about the same time. He was in full communication with M. Jules Favre, and I think he left Paris entirely in accordance with the consent of M. Jules Favre himself; and when he found that there would be a centre of communication with the French Government out of Paris he judged rightly in acting on the instructions of Lord Granville, that he had better repair thither, and there act on behalf of Her Majesty’s Government, rather than remain in Paris subject to all the difficulties which an investment by a hostile army would cause. I do not know that I need enter into further detail; but if there be any other explanation that I can give the right hon. Baronet I shall be glad to do so.

SIR ROBERT PEEL : In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I shall bring before the House on an early opportunity the question of Lord Lyons leaving Paris.

METROPOLIS—CAB FARES.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the recent conflicting decisions given by various Police Magistrates as to the present cab fares in the metropolis; and, whether he has considered the propriety of taking steps to remedy the inconvenience and uncertainty thus caused?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, the regulations with respect to the Question of the hon. Gentleman are certainly in accordance with the intention of the Act 31 Vict., which provides that whenever the fare now payable by law in the case of any hackney carriage on a stand shall not amount to the sum of 1s. the driver shall be entitled to charge 1s. It certainly was the intention of the promoters of the Act, and of those who framed the regulations, that where a third person was carried an additional 6d. should be paid for any distance short of a mile. An amended regulation removing the doubt as to the interpretation of the clause, and in accordance with this view, will shortly be issued.

IRELAND—QUALIFICATION FOR HIGH SHERIFFS.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether any, and, if so, what qualification is required for the office of High Sheriff of an Irish County; and, whether he is of opinion that a gentleman possessing neither lands nor residence in Ireland is legally qualified and liable to serve that office?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. DOWSE) said, in reply, if the hon. Member's Question had related to a mere abstract point of law, he should have been indisposed to enter upon it; but if it related, as he assumed it did, to the recent appointment of the High Sheriffs of Westmeath and Louth, he was in a position to state that the High Sheriffs of those counties had been selected by the Lord Lieutenant in the usual way from the list sent in to him by the Judges. He must assume that the Judges had done their duty, and had returned the names of gentlemen duly qualified and liable to serve as high sheriffs. Under these circumstances, he trusted the hon. Member would think that he was not justified in proceeding further in the matter.

MR. MONK said, in consequence of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Answer, he should proceed with the Motion of which he had given Notice for that evening.

Mr. Bowring

RELIGIOUS RESTRICTIONS ON JEWISH LABOUR.—QUESTION.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that several poor Jews have recently been subjected to heavy fines by Manchester magistrates, under the provisions of the Workshops' Regulation Act, for working on Sundays; and, whether it is his intention during this Session of Parliament to amend the Act so as to remove this injustice?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that his attention had not been specially called to the cases referred to; but he was aware that persons of the Jewish persuasion were subjected to hardships under the present law. Those hardships, however, arose, not so much from the operation of the Workshops' Regulation Act as from that of the general law of the country, which prohibited work being done upon the Christian Sunday. The Jews, by their own religion, were prevented from working on the Saturday, and thus their power of labour was limited to five days in the week. The subject had been considered by the Committee, which had sat upon the Workshops' Regulation Act, and everything had been done, without actually violating the law of the land, to relieve the grievances of the Jews upon this subject. He understood that it was the intention of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Sir David Salomons) to challenge the opinion of the House upon the matter.

PATRONAGE OF THE POST OFFICE. QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in reference to the statement made by the Secretary of State for War that the patronage of the Post Office, as far as practicable, would be used for the purpose of giving employment to Pensioners and persons connected with the Army Reserve, it is the intention of the Government to extend that privilege, in a fair proportion, to persons in a similar position belonging to the Navy?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that the plan for the employment of persons connected with the Army Reserve had been under consideration, but had not yet been matured; and, therefore, he could not give a definite Answer to the Question. He had consulted with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, who agreed with him that if there were any persons in the Navy holding analogous positions to those in the Army Reserve, it would be quite fair that every advantage offered to the latter should be offered to them also.

GRIEVANCES OF CUSTOM HOUSE OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

Mr. GRAVES asked the Secretary to the Treasury, if the Committee appointed in 1869 to investigate certain complaints of the Officers of Her Majesty's Customs in London has completed the inquiry; and, if so, whether it is intended to submit the Report to the House; and, if the inquiry will be extended to the investigation of complaints submitted to the Treasury by the Officers of Her Majesty's Customs at Liverpool and other principal out-ports?

Mr. STANSFELD, in reply, said, the inquiry to which the hon. Member's Question referred had, as he thought he was aware, resolved itself in the main into a question of the organization and the working of the Account and Statistical branches of the Customs in London. That inquiry was now complete, and the Papers would shortly be laid before the House. He hoped the result of the inquiry would be satisfactory in point of simplification and of the reduction of labour and of expense. With regard to the second part of the Question, the Board of Customs had given instructions to the large out-ports to deal with the subject in the same manner as it was dealt with in the port of London.

ELECTIONS BILL.—QUESTION.

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, I wish to ask a Question with reference to the Elections Bill, which has been set down for the second reading on Monday next. It is not yet in the hands of hon. Members, and it would be convenient that they should have further time to consider its details. There is a great deal of other business on the Paper for Monday, and therefore I hope Her Majesty's Government will not proceed with the second reading of the measure on that day?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: The Elections Bill will be delivered to-morrow. And I should hope, under those circumstances, that the House will not object to proceed with the second reading of the measure on the day already fixed for taking it.

Moved, "That the House, at rising, do adjourn till To-morrow at Two o'clock.—(Mr. Gladstone.)"

Motion agreed to.

ARMY ADMINISTRATION.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. TREVELYAN, who had given Notice of his intention to move the following Resolutions:—

"1. That, in the opinion of this House, no scheme for Military reorganization can be regarded as complete which does not alter the tenure of the Command in Chief in such a manner as to enable the Secretary of State for War to avail himself freely of the best administrative talent and the most recent military experience from time to time existing in the British Army;

"2. That the consideration of the cost involved in the abolition of the Purchase system urgently calls for the immediate removal of obsolete and antiquated sources of military expenditure," said, the House would probably be at no loss to understand why the first of the original Resolutions he had intended to move was withdrawn; but he might remark, before proceeding to refer to the remaining ones, that the reason the former Resolution was withdrawn, consisted in the fact that the announcement made by the Secretary of State for War on Thursday night, that the system of purchase in the Army was to be abolished, had given great and unalloyed satisfaction to Army Reformers. ["No, no!"] He believed that to be the case, and also that the satisfaction was not confined to the mere followers of the Government, because he knew that several hon. Members opposite had approved the scheme of the Secretary of State for War, and that many military men who had formerly opposed the abolition of purchase, but who preferred to yield the point rather than subject the service to the disadvantage of the method of officering the Army becoming the subject of continual and acrimonious discussion, thought that if the non-purchase system was to be adopted the Government scheme was satisfactory, it being just to the individual, thorough in its scope, and economical to the public. He congratulated the Government upon having acknowledged the principle that officers were to be compensated not only for the sums they had actually paid out of pocket, but for amounts to which they would have been entitled had the purchase system continued in force, with the exception, of course, of what might be termed "fancy prices." The principle of compensation propounded by the Government was the right one, because it placed the Government in the position towards the officer which would have been occupied by his brother officer had things continued as they were at present. No doubt a great expense would be involved; but he regarded it as a good omen that, when the expenditure was mentioned, the cheers indicating the feeling that the sum was large came from the Opposition Benches, the occupants of which never grudged money when the national honour was concerned, while those hon. Members who were generally supposed to be rather scrupulous guardians of the public purse remained in silent acquiescence. As was inevitable, a proposed change of this kind had created a certain amount of discontent, because it had injured certain interests and rudely shaken some old cherished beliefs. For this reason, he and those Army Reformers who acted with him would always look back with great pleasure upon the fact that by taking the present step they had relieved Her Majesty's Government of some share of the unpopularity attaching to the question. Before leaving this branch of the subject he wished to make a personal statement, and he hoped it would be received in the spirit in which it was offered. What he wished to say was that the peculiarity of purchase was such that those who objected to the educational and moral effect of the Army system of promotion and first appointments were obliged, in expressing their views, to say things annoying to officers who held their commissions under that system. During recent discussions he had no notion that there was any chance of purchase being abolished, and therefore in speaking of it he adopted the tone which men used in speaking of a position they believed to be impregnable; while if he had believed purchase was about to be abolished he should have adopted a different tone. With regard to the second Resolution, he had been told by a great many hon. Members that, having got to a part of what he wanted, and a most valuable part too, it was time to withdraw the rest, as he must not be exacting and impracticable. In his opinion, however, a man need not have been many years in that House to know what was the precise point at which it was best to his individual interest to withdraw from a question in which he had gained a certain amount of success. But, in his opinion, and in the opinion of many others who had advocated the question in the country, he had no right to arrange away the object of a Motion on which he had been engaged with any considerable success. The cause was not theirs to bargain with or compromise; and although he adopted with unfeigned gratitude the concessions which had been made as generous and real, still as regarded what had not been conceded he felt bound to submit the issue to Parliament. This was the course he intended to pursue. He had no doubt he should be beaten. Four years ago he and those who thought with him were well beaten on the purchase system. Three years ago they brought forward exactly the scheme the Government was now proposing, except that Government had made certain alterations which he fully acknowledged to be ameliorations on his scheme. He should, therefore, state his case to the House in the firm belief that it would not require many more annual Tuesdays before the present exceptional tenure of the office of Commander-in-Chief should have gone where the purchase system had gone before.

The Secretary of State had made several excellent and sweeping changes in relation to the War Office and Horse Guards, particularly as regarded the number of letters which had passed between the Departments; whereas nothing should have passed except Minutes. He strongly recommended hon. Gentlemen to read the evidence of Mr. Godley, the late Deputy Assistant Secretary for the War Office, before the Army Organization Committee of 1861, in reference to this subject. Mr. Godley there said that the feeling of the Army towards the War Office was quite different from that of the Navy towards the Admiralty, the former regarding with jealousy the civil departments which checked and controlled the heads of the Army. Now, how did the Secretary of State for War propose to remedy this? The first step was to alter the wording of the patent by which the Commander-in-Chief was appointed. The right hon. Gentleman soon found that this alteration was not sufficient, and Lord Northbrook, Sir Edward Lugard, and Sir William Anderson concurred in that view. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War then proposed to amalgamate the two Departments by a change of locality. But this would not, in his (Mr. Trevelyan's) opinion, be sufficient. It was not by an alteration of the arrangement of any rooms and passages in a public Office that he could alter the relations between a Parliamentary temporary officer and a permanent public servant of the highest rank, who had held office for 14 years under a system of administration and in a position entirely different from that which now existed. If the Secretary of State were to sit at his desk at one end of the room, and the Commander-in-Chief at his desk at the other, the present relations would still exist so long as the military adviser of the Secretary of State was a permanent officer with the rank and title of Commander-in-Chief. It was idle to say that the office was not permanent because it was held only during the pleasure of the Crown. In such a state of things the Commander-in-Chief could not be removed from his office without some stigma being inflicted, which no Government had a right to inflict, especially on an officer who had always done his very best—as the present Commander-in-Chief had done—to the Army and his country. So long as the Commander-in-Chief was a permanent officer, taking precedence in men's minds of every officer in the Army, the post must, of necessity, be conferred on a Royal personage, or upon a general of great age and classic reputation. In the great majority of cases the Commander-in-Chief would be drawn from the second of the two classes he had mentioned, and in that case he must almost necessarily be a man who had lived so long as to be past his work, with the further disadvantage that, once appointed, he could not be removed, although the older he grew the less efficient would he become. How could a Secretary of State—a young man perhaps, go to an officer, who at the period of the Secretary's birth was engaged in fighting and beating the French, the Affghans, or the Sikhs, and tell him that he was behind his time, and must give place to a younger man. And war having become more of an art, it was every year more necessary that there should be a rapid succession of new ideas at head quarters, instead of a series of men who would stick to the experience of their youth until that experience had become obsolete. In addition to this consideration, it would, in his opinion, be a great advantage if the position of Commander-in-Chief could be offered as a reward to a great number of the ablest soldiers in succession, in which case officers would be stimulated to greater exertion by the prospect. Who had been the Commanders-in-Chief of the British Army within a recent period? First, he would mention Lord Amherst; then the Duke of York, who filled the office from 1794 to 1809; next Sir David Dundas, who merely occupied the place as a sort of warming-pan during the two years in which Lord Palmerston vindicated in his person the position of Secretary of State for War; and he, in turn, was followed by the Duke of York in 1811, after whom came Lord Hill, who filled the office for 14 years, and was succeeded by the Duke of Wellington. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would perhaps not care to hear anything that he might say of the Duke of Wellington. But what was said by Lord Grey, who was better acquainted with military affairs than any other civilian? Lord Grey stated that the Duke showed an indisposition to any change of system in the Army; that he objected, in the strongest manner, to giving up the old musket for the new rifle; and that he pertinaciously opposed any alleviation in the extreme severity of corporal punishment then in vogue, and the exemption of well-conducted men from that punishment. Now if the Duke of Wellington had been Commander-in-Chief only for a few years immediately after the Peninsular War, the country would have had the greatest administrator in the world filling that office; but as it was, the Duke remained at his post till he did more harm than good, because he was opposed to changes in the material of war essential to the defence of the country. This, however, must be said for him, that though he left the country undefended he was always a great economist, and though he left the country undefended it was undefended at a very little cost indeed. Lord Hardinge next filled the office, from 1852 to 1856, and of all Commanders-in-Chief he did most good; but, unfortunately, he died before he had filled the office four years. The reason why his career was looked upon as a bright spot in the history of the Horse Guards was that nature did for him what the Army Reformers proposed to do for the Army by this five years' appointment. Suppose that, instead of a succession of old officers, they had had a succession of comparatively young men, ranging from 45 to 60, would the Army now be in the state in which the Secretary for War found it? He saw a noble Lord opposite (Lord E. Cecil) with whom he had not often agreed during the course of the last autumn, though he was quite sure they were still on very pleasant terms, and that noble Lord proposed, in a letter to The Times, that a colonel and major should hold an appointment for three or five years. Well, if it was important that the man at the head of a regiment should hold a limited appointment, he thought it was more important that the officer at the head of the Army should hold a limited appointment. In India the Commander-in-Chief, whose business was administration, held a five years' appointment, and the Military Secretary, whose business was promotion, held a five years' appointment. Why, then, should the Commander-in-Chief, who united in his own person the administration and promotion, have a permanent tenure? Another method of dealing with this question was to give the work of the bureau to a man of humbler title than that of the Commander-in-Chief. He might be called chief of the Staff, military secretary, or adjutant general, still having the command-in-chief at the head of the whole Army. If we looked at the example of Prussia, it was most important that the head of the whole Army should be relieved from all paper work, and that he should spend his days in going about from district to district, and seeing that the generals of those districts did their duty, and in seeing whether the arsenals were in a proper state—he (Mr. Trevelyan) hoped we should soon have local arsenals—and in seeing that the general Staff were thoroughly educated in military matters, and did what was required of them. On that point he had the very high authority of Lord Grey, who strongly recommended that we should have a board at the War Office, which board should have the advice of military officers, just as the Admiralty had a board who had the advice of naval officers. He did not venture to point out to the House what remedy should be proposed for the present state of things; but he asked them to affirm by their vote that night that the permanent holding of the office of Commander-in-Chief was not to the advantage of the Army or the country. The Secretary of State for War, in his very interesting speech on Thursday evening, dwelt almost entirely on promotion with regard to the duties of the Commander-in-Chief. He said it was necessary that the person in whose hands those very large powers were vested should be appointed by the Commander-in-Chief, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. Now, in the year 1869, out of 571 promotions only 116, or one-fifth of the whole, were without purchase. What an enormous responsibility, therefore, was left on the shoulders of the Commander-in-Chief! When the right hon. Gentleman remarked that the purchase system did away with favouritism, he was much cheered by hon. and learned Gentlemen; and no wonder, because so long as the present system was continued promotion would run very much in the same set of persons. It was curious to see how the five years' rule had been set aside. One single officer obtained a series of five years' appointments. He was for 10 years quartermaster general at the Horse Guards, after that he was Governor General of Gibraltar, then he became adjutant general, and he had no doubt that when his time was up he would become quartermaster general again. The result of this permanency of office was curiously shown in the ideas current at the Horse Guards. He now came to a point on which he was aware he was trenching on delicate ground. After he had said things on the platform in the country he was not the man to be afraid of saying them, he hoped in becoming terms, in his place in the House of Commons. The Secretary of State for War, on Thursday, said Her Majesty's Government thought that the position of the Commander-in-Chief must be looked upon as exceptional, and that time could not be taken into account with reference to his continuance in or removal from office. In case of invasion everything would depend upon who would lead our soldiers in battle. How would the commanders of our battalions be chosen? The Commission which sat in 1857 recommended that the Commander-in-Chief should be authorized to select them from the heads of battalions. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, being asked by the Commission whether he thought that what was applicable to colonels should not also be applicable to lieutenant colonels, said he thought not, because a colonel did not command a regiment; he was a mere nominal head; he was selected for services performed in former days, and his appointment was given to him as a reward for services. He was asked, if the Commander-in-Chief were backed by public opinion could he not go a step further than the rejection of bad officers and select the fittest men? His answer was—

“I think not. My opinion is very decided that the power of selection is impossible, whether exercised by a military man or a civilian, and I do not think that any man having that power would hold his position for six months in the country.”

And, again, the Commander-in-Chief said—“I don't see how you can make a standard of selection.” [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that in no country had the problem been solved. It had been solved in Prussia; it had been solved in France. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might smile when he mentioned the French Army as an illustration of the successful solution of the problem; but it was evident that when two nations, which officered their armies by selection, went to war one must win and the other lose, and the defects of the French troops were no argument against the wisdom of the principle of selection. But it was not in foreign countries only, but in England also that the question had been solved. Every service constituted on a proper basis had within it such a public opinion that promotion, to a great extent, could not be wrongly made against that public opinion. Let them look at the Indian Civil Service, in which though here and there a little favouritism might have crept in, yet no good man could be long kept back from the promotion which he merited. Again, take the case of the masters of our public schools. These posts were practically filled by the strictest open competition; and, whenever a bad appointment was made, the noise of it rang from one end of the country to the other. Of course, the public opinion of the Army could be brought to bear by calling for confidential reports from the officers in command of the various districts, and one of the advantages of localizing the Army would be that these reports might be sent in, and the duty of making the appointment left to the Horse Guards. The Secretary of State for War, the other evening, said—

“That you would do harm in the Army if, in abolishing purchase, you substituted seniority pure and simple. I believe the truth is that if you abolish purchase you must accept the principle of selection. . . . You must not allow inefficient seniority or a system of pecuniary advantage to prevail.”

But the officer who was responsible had assured them beforehand that selection must end in seniority, for he had said, in order that the Commander-in-Chief might guard against the odium arising from promotion by selection, he must adopt the system of pure seniority. Now, it was a very formidable thing when the officer appointed to select not for the next five years, but for the term of his life, made such a statement. He now came to a most important point. The Secretary of State for War had said that there was one important consideration at the root of this part of the question—namely, that it was just possible, after spending the large sum of money estimated to be necessary for the abolition of purchase, they might be laying the foundation of a system of underhand purchase. And what said the Commander-in-Chief on that point?—

“That with the large fortunes which gentlemen in this country possessed it would be very difficult to abolish the purchase system, and that if it were to be abolished to-morrow, you would have—in spite of all the care and attention that the authorities could give—an underhand system of purchase going on the next day.”

Now, the nation could not be placed in such a dilemma if they had a Commander-in-Chief with a strong hand, who was determined to make his selections so as that no one should know beforehand whether he was going to be promoted or not, and who was also resolved to punish severely any officer immoral enough to give money for promotion after the right of purchase had been abolished. But it was to a Department animated by such a spirit that they were going to commit what General Trochu called the “corner-stone” of our military defences. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had asked three questions the other night. First, he had asked—Were they prepared to deal with the question of retirement? He replied—Yes, they were prepared to take a national and lively interest in it, when they were once assured that the retirement money would not go to sinecurists, but to officers who had spent their lives in the service of their country. The right hon. Gentleman next asked—Were they prepared to adopt the principle of selection? He (Mr. Trevelyan) replied—Yes, if the task of carrying out that principle were not to be committed to men who had over and over again declared themselves to be unequal to the burden. The third question of the right hon. Gentleman was—Are you prepared to sacrifice a large sum of public money for the purpose of extinguishing purchase? He answered—Yes, if it were not that they had been told by those who were responsible that all that money would be sacrificed in vain. He did not feel justified, after having spent four or five months in recommending the nation to abolish purchase—[Ironical cheers—]he did not feel justified, now that purchase was going to be abolished, at a cost of £7,000,000 or £8,000,000, in letting the occasion pass without solemnly warning them that, unless the tenure of the office of Commander-in-Chief was limited as he proposed, every penny of it would be spent in vain. He did not think anyone who considered the largeness of the sum, and the importance of the issues involved, would hold that a Member of Parliament who had put the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief on selection before the House had made a gratuitous personal attack, or had exceeded his right as a taxpayer or his duty as a Member of Parliament.

The Secretary of State for War had dwelt very much on the question of promotion; but they must remember that the military advisers of the Crown had also other duties to perform. Military gentlemen had a very great distrust of the knowledge which civilians had of military matters. He could assure those gentlemen they had not a deeper sense of their deficiency than had civilians themselves, and there was no civilian who was more sensible of his deficiency than the man who from time to time was at the head of the War Office. Therefore, the more unable a civilian was to initiate a military policy the more necessary was it for him to have at hand military men who could give him the best advice. The right hon.

Mr. Trevelyan

Gentleman the Secretary of State was the very last man behind the back of his responsible advisers to ask advice from other men. Nothing in official life created so many heartburnings as the adoption of such a course. But let the House consider for a moment how far the authorities of the Horse Guards were competent to give the Secretary for War sound and intelligent assistance in the solution of the great questions that would have to be solved in the course of the next two or three years. We should have to decide whether we should make a separation between the home and foreign battalions, because, until that was done, the Short Enlistment Act would be a nullity. We should also have to make up our minds whether we should localize our army by making a complete re-division of the country into military districts, and, when we had done that, whether we should have a system of local supply and local arsenals. He would go further, and place the supply in the hands of the generals of the districts. Then we should have to go into military education, which was almost an innovation in this country. On all these questions the latest information and the best advice would be required. He was aware the Government would say—"It is quite true we require good officers. We are responsible for our subordinates; it is not fair to attack them. If anything is wrong, attack us." His answer was—"It is quite true the Government are responsible for naming their executive; but the House of Commons is responsible, especially after the speech of the Secretary of State, for ordaining what the tenure of office is to be which those officers are to hold." Well, then, what was the policy of that Department on which they had conferred such high powers? The Horse Guards—and here he dropped any allusion to individuals—had invariably opposed every improvement in which the country, and he believed in which officers who best knew their business, had taken an interest. The Horse Guards had always opposed the abolition of excessive flogging. Two years ago flogging had been finally abolished, but the Horse Guards thought we ought to go on flogging still. The other night the Secretary of State spoke of "marking," that is branding, but he called it by the more pleasant name. The Horse Guards opposed the abolition of that. When a Committee recommended to the Secretary of State, with a view to the improvement of the position of the soldier, that he should be excused from paying for barrack damages, amounting to about a penny a month, the recommendation was not received with favour by the Horse Guards; but when it was proposed to increase the self-respect of the private soldier by marking deserters with the letter D, they assented to that with shameful alacrity. As to the question of long and short service, it was notorious that the greatest obstacles were thrown in the way of the carrying out of the long and short service Act by what might be called military men of the old school and the Horse Guards generally. Then came a question which related to a matter which was absolutely essential to the well-being of the Army—the turning out of incorrigibly bad characters; and it was well known that with respect to it the colonels could hardly get that authority which they all frequently wished to exercise. Then, with regard to promotion in the ranks. While he was not one of those who thought that elderly soldiers ought to be promoted, he was of opinion that promotion should be had recourse to in the case of young men who showed military aptitude, so that the feeling of hope in the lower ranks of the service might be kept alive. The Horse Guards seemed to be of that opinion also, because he found that during the years 1854, 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1858, when they were engaged in deadly struggles in the Crimea and in India, no less than 483 privates were promoted from the ranks; but when peace returned the door was shut in their faces, and during the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, the promotions from the ranks were respectively three, four, and eight. In a Minute issued by Sir William Mansfield in India, he said that the discharge of bad characters from the Army raised the condition of the soldier, and that he would make the discharge from it looked upon as a punishment and the remaining in it a privilege. It was well known that in time of war commissions were almost of no value whatsoever. Then officers were not able to leave the Army except owing to invalidity or death, and the consequence was that at the end of the war the value of commissions fell almost to nothing. In the Crimean War the value of commissions fell very low indeed, and the consequence was that men like Lord Clyde, Lord Strathnairn, and others would have abolished purchase at the moment when we might have got rid of it for a much smaller sum than at present. He recollected that at that time persons now in the Army would have thought it a good investment to get rid of purchase. Warning was given the Horse Guards at the time; but they refused to take advantage of the golden opportunity. On the contrary, the system had been extending ever since, and whatever might now be the cost to the nation of abolishing it—whether it should prove to be £7,000,000, or £8,000,000, or less, or, as some anticipated, as much as £11,000,000, the expense certainly would be some millions more than it would have been in 1856, and Army Reformers might fairly say that all that extra cost was attributable to the Horse Guards. Within the last 18 years £300,000,000 had been spent on the Army, and the yearly Estimates had gone up from £8,000,000 to £14,000,000, which were spent under the advice and auspices of that Department. Yet those very Gentlemen who were always praising the Horse Guards in Committee upstairs and at public dinners, did not hesitate to tell us that we were utterly defenceless, that we were a nation of shopkeepers, and that all the weakness of the country, in a military point of view, was owing to the parsimonious policy that had been pursued. The burden of proof ought, he thought, to be thrown on those Gentlemen and the Horse Guards, and they ought to be called upon to show why they wanted more money, seeing that so many millions had already been expended to render our Army efficient. They were told, however, that though the Horse Guards up to this time had been reactionary, they had now altered their tactics and were going to march with the times; that they had swallowed the abolition of purchase, and that therefore the new order of things might be safely initiated under their auspices. He begged to say, however, that what the nation wanted was not military advisers who, when no other course was open to them, could “swallow” this or that reform, but men who could themselves originate and devise the necessary innovations. The Secretary for War ought, he thought, scarcely to be called upon to expend so much vital power in forcing reforms down the throats of men who should have initiated them, as had been the case with his right hon. Friend now at the head of the Department during the last few months. The truth was, he ought to surround himself with men such as those whose services the First Lord of the Admiralty had secured, whom it would be his duty rather to regulate and restrain than always to be urging on in the path of reform.

He must add that the pleasure which he had derived from the statement of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War the other evening was somewhat spoilt by the aspect of the Estimates. It was, no doubt, because his right hon. Friend had so much to say that he gave no explanation on points which were almost of as much interest as the purchase question. He alluded especially to the reappearance of certain antiquated and objectionable items in the Estimates which swallowed up a great deal of money. The right hon. Gentleman would, he hoped, seize the present opportunity to inform the House what was meant by those items. He had recently made a comparison of the cost of the English Army and that of the Army which it most resembled—or did two or three years ago—namely, the French. In 1868 the latter consisted of 400,000 men, and it cost something over £15,000,000, but a portion of that amount—perhaps a great deal—went to keeping up the Reserves. Still, he would argue as if the whole £15,000,000 were spent on the peace establishment, which would make the cost of each man £37 10s. In 1871-2 our Army numbered 133,000, and the cost was £14,697,000. If you deduct for the pay, pensions, and equipments of the Reserve forces £2,348,000, and for the issue of warlike stores to the Navy, £263,000; the result is a sum of £12,086,000 for the Army, or an average of £89 per man. Now, they would be told, perhaps, that theirs was a colonial Army, which cost a large sum for transport. But £250,000 is taken for transport on the Navy Estimates. We are told that we have voluntary enlistment, while Continental armies are raised by conscription. But let them consider what difference that made. The private soldier received 6d. a day. In any case, however the ranks were recruited, the nation must feed and clothe its Army, so that the daily 6d. was the whole additional charge, and that represented a total of £1,035,000. Deducting that sum from the Estimates, the cost of the British soldier was still £80, or more than twice that of the French soldier. What were the real causes of the difference? First, he would point out that we had 275 generals of cavalry, and 48 generals of artillery and engineers, 323 in all; whereas, in one year, only 42 of them were employed, and in the present year only 30 of them were employed at home. Of the whole number, 168 were over 65 years of age. It was evident that until they named exactly their working establishment of generals, and promoted only on it, there would be no end of jobbery. He must also say that 148 of those gentlemen were colonels of regiments, and that £162,500 was swallowed up in the payment of sinecure honorary Army colonelcies. He knew of one officer who, between the age of 32 and 52, had received £40,000 of pension in addition to his salary. The first condition of a pension was that it should not be taken at the same time as salary; but there was not a single officer, either at the War Office or the Horse Guards, who did not receive, or hope to be receiving, at some stage of his career from £1,000 to £2,000 a-year, in addition to a very adequate salary. The next condition of a pension was that it should be given upon fixed and impartial rules, and in certain proportion to the length of service and the amount of salary received. The fact, however, was that of two officers of equal service and merit, but unequal position and interest, one got a colonelcy with £1,800, £2,000, or £2,200 a-year, and the other languished in retirement on 25s. a day. He would pass over the half-pay list, because it was a sort of antechamber or succedaneum to the purchase system. It was used, to a great extent, to assist the purchase system; but it ought to be reduced by every officer who was not a temporary invalid. That was the proper use of half-pay. Above all, you ought not to have able-bodied men who were on unattached pay and promotion. What would our Civil Service Estimates be if we had a supplementary list of Judges, unattached Commissioners in Bankruptcy and Lunacy, and Inspectors of Schools? The proper rule was that no man should receive pay for work that he was not doing, or a pension for work that had not been done. An item which he (Mr. Trevelyan) was ashamed of seeing again in the Estimates was that of Army agents, to whom £37,231 had been paid this year. What were the duties of those agents? In the first place, they kept the banking accounts of the officers; but if the State paid men for being the bankers of officers, it might as well pay Messrs. Tod Heatley for being the wine merchants of the same officers' messes. Then they were credited with managing the purchase system, but that was only as bankers managed the transfer of balances, or as house agents managed the transfer of property; and you might as well, when a living was sold, pay out of the diocesan fund the agent who advertised that living. The Army agents handed over to the officers their pay after receiving it from the Paymaster General; but if the paymaster of a regiment could contrive to pay 800 or 1,000 men, surely he could pay some 30 officers besides? According to the most eminent of our living public servants (Sir William Anderson), it would be cheaper to pay that class £40,000 a year for doing nothing whatever. He next came to expenses generally allowed to be legitimate and normal, but which a household Parliament must certainly examine—the exceptional payments made to officers of the Brigade of Guards. These officers now paid highly for their commissions, and, having regard to the money thus sunk by them, it would be unjust to reduce the salaries of existing officers. But in future why should a lieutenant colonel of the Guards receive 26*s.* 9*d.* a day and the lieutenant colonel of a Line regiment 17*s.*? Why should a major in the Guards receive 6*s.*, a captain 4*s.*, and a lieutenant 1*s.* more than officers of the corresponding rank in ordinary regiments? The special allowances to officers in the Guards must also be reduced. Then came the greatest and most useless expenditure on the Household Cavalry. To begin with, the officers were much more highly paid; but he would not go into that just now. Let him, however, contrast the average expense of the Household Cavalry and the ordinary cavalry. Including the cost of clothing and the pay of officers, the cost of a private in the former was £87 as against £57; while with the purchase of horses it was £114 as against £83 in the cavalry, and £46 in the infantry. The proportion of officers was as one to 13 men in the Household Brigade and in the cavalry of the Line as one to 16. Why was this Brigade wanted? The men were quite unsuited for modern warfare; they were too heavy for escort and they were not wanted as police. In the French Army, which was so much greater than ours, the Emperor's Cent Gardes consisted of only 221 men. In England the Royal escort consisted of 1,332 men, which was quite 1,000 too many. The nation would never believe the House of Commons was in earnest about economy as long as they paid £80,000 or £90,000 more than was necessary for the Royal escort. Next he came to Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, which were of the same nature as Greenwich. Acting in the belief that old men might live far better in homes of their own, at a cost of £27 or £36, than pass a disagreeable and disreputable sort of monastic life at a cost of £90, Parliament wound up Greenwich Hospital, which might be said to be closed by the almost unanimous suffrages of the old men themselves. A Commission was appointed to consider the propriety of applying the same principles to Chelsea and Kilmainham; but the majority of the members had a stronger feeling in favour of retaining the good appointments held by brother officers than they had either for the welfare of the old men or the cost of Chelsea and Kilmainham to the State. Next came the largest of these items—£1,300,000 for men's pensions; and as bearing on it, Government should declare whether the short system was to be practically worked by the separation of the home and foreign battalions, and whether they would not say to a man—“We will take you for three years, and at the end of that time we will send you back to your business and your sweetheart.” Till this is done—till you cease to reserve the right of keeping a man for six years, and sending him to Aden or Jubbulpore—you will never give a fair chance to short service, or diminish your pension fund. Another point was the expense of the Horse Guards. In 1794 Lord Amherst, who must have been a very economical administrator, left the expenses of the Horse Guards at £894. He got a War Office clerk, and paid him 10*s.* a day extra for his services as secretary. The Duke of York appointed an Army colonel as secretary, and the expenses increased; for, according to the Report of a Commission of Inquiry, they amounted in 1809 to £7,638. The expenses of the Horse Guards were now £49,311, of which sum £23,843 went to military men, in addition to their pay and their other emoluments. At the Admiralty the Senior Naval Lord had £1,500 a-year in addition to half-pay; the Junior Lord £1,000; and the Captain for the reserve business, £365; with a Private Secretary at £365—that was to say, that the Navy was well worked in that department of the business for £3,230, as opposed to £23,843. He spoke under correction; but if the pay of the present Military Secretary at the Horse Guards had not been lately docked, this officer alone received, including his honorary colonelcy, over £3,000 a-year. His successor would get £2,500 per annum, which was a very good salary for an amanuensis and a mouthpiece. The corresponding office at the Admiralty was filled by a captain on half-pay, who received £1 a-day in addition to his half-pay. He (Mr. Trevelyan) would be the first to own that the country was not in a condition for the Secretary at War beginning a great system of military re-organization two years ago. The Government had reduced the number of men by 20,000, and did so with the full approbation of the country; but it was to be regretted that the Government did not feel itself warranted at the same time to put an end to the rich sinecures of which he now complained. Every soldier under the administration at the War Office of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) cost £59; and every soldier at the present time cost exactly the same or a fraction more. There could be no doubt that the country was ripe for re-organization, as also for an immense and sweeping reduction in the expenditure. The practice hitherto had been to heap new expenditure on old; but in a place of business it was the custom to provide for new claims by the extinction of old, and, as had been well said by the First Lord of the Treasury, at Warrington, in 1868—

“Who supposes that expenditure of £70,000,000 a-year goes down every year to the same purpose? You cannot stereotype the wants of a great Empire. New wants are always coming forward; but where there are new wants, and where provision has to be made for new wants, that provision ought to be counterbalanced by new economies.”

Mr. Trevelyan

The First Lord of the Treasury and the Secretary for War would have an opportunity at this early period of the Session to see where these new economies could be best made and what old abuses should be sacrificed. He was confident that the whole of these items, which had been so long subjected to hostile criticism, would disappear from the Estimates when the last vested interests had died out; and their disappearance would not only tend much to disarm opposition in that House, but also confer the greatest benefit on the country. There was at present a growing feeling that a vigorous re-organization, if accompanied by internal economy, would place the national defences on a good footing without adding a penny to the present Estimates. If the present Estimates were persisted in, it would be a cruel check to the interest the country was taking in its Army when they found that increased efficiency meant only increased expenditure on all the old items. The country had been imploring in certain dumb ways, but very earnestly, for a national Army, and it was cruel to answer it by giving another £3,000,000 to the Horse Guards, and by strengthening the hands of its officials by publicly endorsing their permanent tenure of office. Men judged the unseen by the seen, and when these objectionable items appeared every year it was thought tolerably certain that a reactionary military influence had power in matters removed from the world's notice. If the form of these Estimates was final, their passage through Committee would be one long protest. He and others would fight the Army agencies; they would fight the honorary colonelcies; they would fight every job and every sinecure from the first page of the Estimates to the last. But if the Government acted as their antecedents would lead men to expect, and their supporters had a right to ask, then—speaking not in name of any, but expressing the sense of many who sat around him, he would venture to say that, whatever abuse Ministers assailed, whatever expenditure they asked for not for the purpose of temporarily increasing, but of permanently consolidating the national forces, they would be met, from that part of the House, in a spirit of well-grounded confidence and gratified loyalty. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. ANDERSON, in seconding the Motion, desired to compliment the hon. Member on his exhaustive speech; and to join with him in thanking the Government for the bold step they had taken in abolishing the purchase system. But while he thought that did entitle them to some consideration for shortcomings in other respects, it did not atone for the conspicuous absence for three years past in their Estimates of any propositions dealing with abuses in high places. The Government had exhibited great tenderness and timidity there, though it was notorious that it was in the highest ranks that the expenditure was most lavish. The Government might think little of this omission, but the tax-payers—especially those of the large constituencies—did not think lightly of it; the public would be inquiring why the Government had not dealt with the redundant list of general officers, with the large half-pay list, and with the sinecure colonelcies. The other evening the Secretary for War passed a high eulogium on the disinterestedness of officers: he was so impressed by the greatness of the subject that he could only express his sentiments by having recourse to poetry; but the quotation he made, though somewhat high-flown, was so pertinent to the subject of sinecure colonelcies and other highly paid offices that he desired permission to repeat it—

Such outward things dwell not in their desires;
But if it be a sin to covet honour
They are the most offending souls alive.”

Had this passage not been used by the Secretary for War, whom he could not suspect of irony, he should have thought it was not free from a touch of sarcasm; but, as it was, he was left to wonder why the Secretary for War had omitted to put some of the honorary colonels and other highly paid officers under his control to the test. The question at issue was what should be substituted for purchase. The evils of promotion by seniority had been largely dwelt upon by the Secretary for War before announcing his preference for promotion by selection. Was it not almost certain that, under the system proposed by the Secretary of State—selection in the hands of the Horse Guards' Staff, in a very short time merit and private interest would become convertible terms, and that they would very soon have very great developments of merit in quarters where hitherto it had been quite unexpected? Why, selection by merit, as it was called, had been the basis of those very sinecure colonelcies of which his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) had spoken. It was under selection by merit that the present Commander-in-Chief was appointed in 1856 at £4,500 a-year; and, as if that honour and gold were not enough, in 1861 the Commander-in-Chief became colonel of the Guards, for which he received an additional £2,200 a-year. Again, the present Military Secretary was appointed either in 1859 or 1860 at somewhere about £2,200 a-year; and, as if that honour and gold were not enough, in 1863 he became colonel of the 81st Regiment with an additional £1,000 a-year. These were the things which selection by merit had given them under the present Horse Guards. He might be told that these sinecure colonelcies were intended as rewards for long and distinguished service. Well, they found that the Prince of Wales, for long and distinguished service no doubt, became colonel of the 10th Hussars, receiving for that £1,350 a-year, being both honour and gold. He believed that officers of the Army were not much afraid of the abolition of purchase, but were much afraid of what would happen to them under selection by merit in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief at the Horse Guards, and still more in the hands of the Military Secretary. He could not ignore the circumstance that the present Commander-in-Chief was a Royal Duke, and that many hon. Members might consider it very profane indeed to criticize the acts of so great a personage; but he (Mr. Anderson) referred to the Commander-in-Chief not as a Royal Duke, but as a public officer, and considered his rank should neither exempt him from criticism, nor on the other hand cause that criticism to be unfair. But there were other objections to the Staff of the Horse Guards quite irrespective of the present personnel. The present Staff had never worked well. There had always been a jealousy and a jarring amounting to a contest between the Crown and Parliament for the control of the Army. That contest culminated in the Order of November, 1861, “given at our Royal Court of Balmoral,” in which the Crown attempted to wrest from the Secretary of State for War a large part of his powers. Very fortunately that Order was disregarded; but, nevertheless, they had had a sort of dual government in the Army ever since. And although the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had told them that there was an end of that dual government, and that he was himself the real head of the Army, circumstances cropped up every now and then which showed that, even if dual government was at an end, a great deal of the old jealousy still existed. It was evident that the Army did not acknowledge the right hon. Gentleman as its real head, and that the Horse Guards did not attempt to put down that insubordination. A glaring instance of that occurred the other day, when a distinguished officer made a speech, at Manchester, denouncing the reductions in the Army that had been decided upon by his chief. If that gallant officer had acknowledged the Secretary of State as his chief he would no more have made that speech than he would have allowed any of his own men to stand up at a public meeting and denounce his acts; and if the Horse Guards had looked upon that speech with such disapproval as it ought to have done it would have called that officer to account. The simple remedy for the evil was to discontinue the office of Commander-in-Chief, and to have the duties performed by Military Under Secretaries of State for War, or Military Lords, as they might please to call them—thus assimilating the discharge of the duties of the Horse Guards to those discharged by the Admiralty. It was long since they abolished the office of Lord High Admiral, and he saw no necessity for perpetuating the office of Commander-in-Chief. He would recommend hon. Gentlemen to turn to the Estimates and compare the Votes for the Horse Guards with those for the Admiralty. The First Lord of the Admiralty had £4,500 a year, the First Naval Lord £1,500, and the Secretary £2,000, as compared with £5,000 paid to the Secretary for War, and £4,500 paid to the Military First Lord. But what was the reason for the great difference of scale in the remuneration of the two services? The Navy was their senior—their old, cherished, national service—yet the Army was in every way petted and pampered in the highly-paid offices. Whatever the reason for it was, it could not be that the system of command in the Army was better than in the Navy, because in the Navy if the Senior Naval Lord happened to be ill or absent matters went on quite smoothly, whereas in the Army, as they found from Lord Northbrook's Report, there was no arrangement whatever by which the duties of the Commander-in-Chief could be performed if he were ill or absent. The Military Secretary up to last year received about £2,230 per annum, and the sum was reduced last year to £1,500. At the same time, the salary of the Commander-in-Chief was reduced from £4,440 to £4,000. But those small reductions were actually to be replaced on the Estimates for this year; the pay of the Commander-in-Chief was again raised, and that of the Military Secretary went up again to £2,000 a year. The best course that could be adopted was to discontinue both those offices. The Government had been contented to apply the five years' rule to the Military Secretary, whom they agreed to make a Jonah, in order that by throwing him overboard they might preserve the larger abuse. But military reformers asked for more than this. They demanded that the whole military system should be put upon a sounder basis; that the responsibility should be better defined; that the Horse Guards should be more efficiently administered; that the Secretary for War should have more complete control over military affairs; and that the other offices should be held by Military Lords or by Military Secretaries. He had great pleasure in seconding the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, no scheme for Military reorganization can be regarded as complete which does not alter the tenure of the Command in Chief in such a manner as to enable the Secretary of State for War to avail himself freely of the best administrative talent and the most recent military experience from time to time existing in the British Army."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he had listened with great pleasure to the speech of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), although he differed in opinion from him on much that he had said to the House; and all who had heard him to-night must admit that he had treated a subject of great delicacy and difficulty with admirable tact and ability. He must, however, confess that he was much disappointed to find that the hon. Member had thought it necessary to proceed with his Motion. He had hoped that after the speech which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War made on Thursday night, his hon. Friend would have withdrawn his Notice. He was glad to hear his hon. Friend say to-night that he had entirely abandoned the view he had hitherto entertained, that there was a duality of government in military affairs. He (Captain Vivian) contended that there was no longer any dual government between the War Office and the Horse Guards. In referring to this point, his hon. Friend said he complained not of what the right hon. Gentleman had not done, but of what he had done. Before leaving this part of the subject he wished to correct an error into which his hon. Friend had fallen with respect to the steps that the Secretary for War had taken. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell), when he came into Office, found that the power of the Secretary of State was limited to a certain extent by a Memorandum which had been drawn up in the time of Sir George Lewis, and which had been signed by Her Majesty. By that Memorandum certain restrictions upon the power of the Secretary of State were imposed; the substance of which was that the Secretary of State was not to interfere with the military control or with the patronage of the Army. When the right hon. Gentleman came into Office he appointed a Committee to inquire into the administration of the War Department and the Horse Guards—and he should be doing an injustice to the Commander-in-Chief if he did not say that in that inquiry every facility had been given by His Royal Highness to Lord Northbrook, who presided over the Committee. Her Majesty then issued an Order in Council which defined the duties of the Commander-in-Chief as well as those of two new officers—the Surveyor General and the Financial Secretary for War. In addition to that, his right hon. Friend put a stop to all correspondence by letter between the Departments, and established a central registry for both Departments, to the effect that all correspondence should be carried on by Minute between the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-

Chief. That change had effected a great economy both of time and labour. There was but one more step wanting to complete the union of the two Departments which had not yet been taken, and that was that both Departments should be under the same roof; and that was owing to the fact that there was not sufficient room in the War Office for the accommodation of the whole Office of the Horse Guards. By reason of the reductions that had been effected in the War Department, sufficient room had been now found, and both Offices would soon be under the same roof; so that everything that was needed to put an end to the dual government had now been done. But why, under these circumstances, did the hon. Member (Mr. Trevelyan) press his Motion? It was because he desired that the high officers should be subjected to the ordinary Staff regulation of five years' appointments. He (Captain Vivian) would, therefore, proceed to state some of the objections that had occurred to him against subjecting officers holding such high and important posts in the Army to the five years' tenure. In the first place, let them see how that rule would apply in the case of a most eminent individual holding such an appointment. They all knew how jealously and suspiciously both the House and the country regarded renewals of these appointments. But the Secretary for War and other Ministers had greater opportunities of judging of the fitness of an individual for a particular post than the public had; and, therefore, in the case of a man eminently fitted to discharge the duties of the post, they might possibly desire to retain him; but under the five years' rule they would be afraid to renew the appointment, lest the country should regard such re-appointment as a job. Then, how would the rule apply in the case of a man not quite so capable? Suppose there was a Commander-in-Chief who had done his duty without complaint, but there was another officer still better qualified; the Government would be afraid to dismiss the former before the expiration of his term, lest it should be said they were casting a slur upon his character. How did his right hon. Friend propose to meet that difficulty? He proposed that the continuance in office of the Commander-in-Chief and his removal should depend upon considerations of public policy. The hon. Member thought it was proposed to continue the Commander-in-Chief in perpetuity; but, so far from that being the case, no Minister would dare to retain a person in so high a post if he were unfit to hold the place. The hon. Member said that if this proposal were adopted effete men would be retained in office, and by way of an illustration—which was much to be regretted—he had referred to the case of the Duke of Wellington. On this subject all he (Captain Vivian) would say was that the Duke of Wellington's career and character lived in the remembrance of a grateful country, and would continue to do so as long as England existed as a nation. The hon. Member had referred to the case of foreign countries. He himself (Captain Vivian) would refer to the case of Prussia. Had the question of age arisen in that country, such a man as Moltke might have been removed because he was upwards of 70. Again, in the case of Austria, Radetzky, when he fought his last campaign, was nearer 80 than 70. The question of age was not the consideration; what a Minister was bound to consider was, who was the most fit and efficient man for the office. Whoever he might be, as long as he performed his duty well, the longer he held his appointment, whether for five, ten, or twenty years, so much the better for the country which had the advantage of his services. If a Minister retained a man in office after he had ceased to be efficient, he would deserve to be impeached. The hon. Member (Mr. Trevelyan) did not charge the present Commander-in-Chief with being inefficient, but simply desired that the duration of his appointment should be limited to five years. Now he (Captain Vivian) took issue with his hon. Friend upon that point. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the question of selection, and stated that hereafter the duty of selection would be left to the Commander-in-Chief, who had stated that it would be impossible for him to exercise that duty. No one who had considered the question of selection in the Army could fail to admit that it was beset with the greatest possible difficulty. It was not at all surprising that everyone should say—"I cannot possibly see how you purpose to select your officers." But he would remind the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) that though the Commander-in-Chief gave the evidence which had been quoted, he also said in the House of Lords that if the Government decided upon adopting a principle of selection for the future, he should do his best to carry it out well and conscientiously. When the language of the Commander-in-Chief before the Committee was quoted, his speech in the House of Lords ought not to be forgotten. It was no part of his (Captain Vivian's) duty, nor would it become him, to say anything in regard to the merits of the present Commander-in-Chief; but he might say that having been selected on several occasions, in the course of the many years he had had a seat in the House, to serve on Committees of Inquiry into military questions—some of them very complicated and difficult ones—he had heard the Duke of Cambridge examined and cross-examined, but on no single occasion had he found His Royal Highness ignorant on any question put before him. He had come to the conclusion that so far as knowledge of the intricate details of our military administration was concerned, no man in England knew more than our present Commander-in-Chief, and he very much doubted whether there was any man who knew as much. He was not going to follow his hon. Friend through all the details of the Estimates; but he wished to refer to an error that he had made in instituting a comparison between the French and the English Estimates. Such a comparison was impossible, because a great many things—shakos, tunics, guns and barrack furniture—were entirely excluded from the French, but included in the English Estimates. Therefore, when his hon. Friend said the annual cost of a French soldier was £37 as compared with £80 for an English soldier, he was incorrect in both cases. A calculation had recently been made by the Government as to what the English soldier did really cost in pay, clothing, and beer money, and this showed that as nearly as possible each man cost £34 a year. Perhaps he might be permitted to say a word on the subject of agents, as his hon. Friend had referred to it, because it was to some extent his (Captain Vivian's) fault that the question was not nearer settlement. It was nearly a year ago since he was asked to report on the subject to the Chief Secretary for War in conjunction with the Accountant-General; and, though the Report was now complete, it had not, from pressure of business, been presented. He must, however, say that his hon. Friend did the agents but scant justice in his very terse explanation of what they did for the Army. While he admitted that it would be possible to pay the officers through other means, he must say, as the result of experience, that it was impossible to exaggerate the advantages which English officers derived from the services of agents. As far as the mere handing over of pay was concerned, that could easily be accomplished without the intervention of agents; but it must be remembered that agents transacted every conceivable kind of business for the officers employing them, and if agencies were abolished to-morrow the extra expense thrown upon officers would be so great that the nation would inevitably have to increase their pay. As his hon. Friend was not accurately informed in regard to the cases of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, and had been very facetious in comparing them with Greenwich Hospital, he would briefly state the facts to the House. Greenwich Hospital was capable of holding 1,500 or 1,800 men, the total number of naval pensioners being about 14,000, and, as a consequence, there were in the Hospital a large number of young men who infinitely preferred going to their homes with an increased pension to remaining in the Hospital. The Government was able to meet the views of these men, because Greenwich Hospital was the richest endowed charity in England, and had large funds to fall back upon in order to give increased pensions. But the case of the other hospitals mentioned was entirely different. Both Hospitals were very small; Chelsea would accommodate 500 or thereabouts, and Kilmainham about 130; while the whole number of Army pensioners was over 60,000, and the men admitted to the two Hospitals were the oldest and most feeble—not to be compared for a moment with the occupants of Greenwich. He had visited the Hospitals of Chelsea and Kilmainham, and found that while in the former there were a few men who would have preferred to go out with an increased pension, the occupants of Kilmainham were unanimous in saying that no amount of added pension could compensate them for the comforts they found in the Hospital. Let his hon. Friend consider what this question of increasing pensions would involve. If an additional 6*d.* per day were given to men as a premium to induce them to leave the Hospitals, the men receiving the same rate of pension who had not been in the Hospital would demand a similar amount as a reward for remaining out of it. He was glad to find that his hon. Friend approved the mode in which the Government proposed that the House should assent to the abolition of purchase. There could be no doubt there were but two ways of dealing with it. It was quite true that three years ago he submitted a scheme which was a modification of that now proposed by his right hon. Friend, and he believed that by the adoption of that plan at that time the question would have been settled; but he must frankly admit that when the purchase system again came under the consideration of the Government he saw no middle course between leaving it alone and abolishing it altogether. The plan of the Government was based upon the principle of doing ample justice to the officers, and he believed it would meet with the general approval of Parliament. His hon. Friend had been kind enough to express approval of the military reforms proposed by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, and, reminding him that Rome was not built in one day, he would ask his hon. Friend not to press his Motion to a Division. His hon. Friend had mentioned that there were circumstances with regard to the rewards to colonels in the Army which would have to be carefully weighed when the House came to consider the systems of promotion and retirement. In reference to this question, he could only say that it would be met and carefully grappled with by his right hon. Friend when the proper time arrived. In conclusion he would remark on the general subject-matter under discussion that he hoped his hon. Friend would be content with the success he had met with, and, taking hope for the future in what had occurred in the past, refrain from pressing his Motion to a Division.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) in his speech that evening had boxed the whole compass of military grievances. He had dealt with 17 or 18 subjects, including the Duke of Cambridge, purchase, selection, flogging, promotion from the ranks, bad characters, the Estimates, the Militia, the War Office, the defenceless state of the country, Army agents, Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, men's pensions, the Horse Guards' Office, the Horse Guards' Secretary, and the rewards to colonels and retired generals. It would, perhaps, have been better if the hon. Gentleman had treated the House to only one or two of the items of that enormous list, because it would be impossible in one, or even in a dozen evenings, to do proper justice to them all. The hon. Member spoke at very great length in reference to the Duke of Cambridge. It was not his (Lord Eustace Cecil's) province to say anything in defence of His Royal Highness; but he must observe that the hon. Gentleman only expressed his own opinions and those of hon. Members sitting near him, and said no single word about the general feeling of the Army in reference to the Commander-in-Chief; but if the officers of the Army were polled, they would say, by an immense majority, that the Duke of Cambridge was the best man that could be found for the office of Commander-in-Chief. Until a more efficient man was discovered, looking to the duties of promotion by selection—an office which, as Lord Grey stated, required superhuman powers—he thought the hon. Gentleman had better cease to say anything about the merits or demerits of the present holder of the office of Commander-in-Chief. But the hon. Gentleman did not content himself with speaking of the Duke of Cambridge; he spoke of the difficulty, as stated by the Duke before a Commission, of selecting officers. Now, he (Lord Eustace Cecil) knew that on one or two occasions His Royal Highness had declined to select particular men, and had refused to appoint them. An officer in his own regiment—he would not mention his name, which had since appeared in the public papers—was reported by his general as not being fit to command his battalion; the Duke of Cambridge entirely endorsed that report, and the result was the officer was told he must retire on half-pay; and immediately he brought an action against the general who so reported him. That was one of the many difficulties they would have to deal with when they came to consider the difficulty of selection on the reports of officers. The hon. Gentleman went on to speak about the Prussian Army, where selection was said to be the rule. Now, he (Lord Eustace Cecil) understood that in the Prussian Army seniority was the rule. There were very few cases of selection indeed; and in one or two branches of the Prussian Army no selection whatever was allowed. One of the schemes of the Government—should promotion by selection be agreed to—was that there should be competitive examinations. In the Prussian Army competition was almost unknown; officers were admitted on nomination by the Executive, and on approval of the officers of the regiment which they wished to join. With reference to the Army agents, the hon. Gentleman must be aware that in 1851 a Committee of that House had reported against their abolition. There could be no doubt that they were of great use. Bills were drawn very frequently at sight, and it would be impracticable for the Secretary at War to meet them; but the Army agents paid them over the counter. There would be no material saving by their abolition; indeed, the abolition of Army agents would be attended with an increase of expense to the amount of at least £9,000 a year. The hon. Member had made a remark about the great number of officers in the British Army in proportion to the number of men. Now, he had taken some trouble to compare the number of officers in the English Army and in the Prussian Army with the number of men they command, and he found that in the Prussian Army there was one officer to 23 men, while in the English Army, according to the Estimates of this year, there was one officer to 22·1 men. In the Italian Army the proportion of officers was one officer to 16 men; and in the United States Army, which was supposed to be very economically managed, and always ready for service at the shortest notice, there was one officer to 15 men. These were facts, and if the hon. Member wished to have his authority for them, he would refer him to the Statesman's Year Book for 1871. The hon. Member had spoken with perfect reason of the large number of officers—one officer to something like 16 men—in the Life Guards, and in the cavalry generally, where it was one officer to 20 men. But when they took the whole service generally, and divided the whole number of men by the number of officers, he held that the English Army stood remarkably well as compared with continental armies. The hon. Gentleman went on to speak of retired generals and sinecure colonels; but he (Lord Eustace Cecil) thought he might have spared himself the trouble of running down veteran officers who, having served their country at the expense both of purse and health, received a retiring pension of something like the magnificent sum of £400 a year. He could not agree with the hon. Member in calling colonels in command of regiments pensioners. Such appointments were not pensions, but rewards—and very small rewards compared with those offered by the Church, diplomacy, and law, after 30 or 40 years' service. It was not for him to go into details about the Horse Guards' Secretary, and other matters. Something, no doubt, might be done. There might be a better system of pensions and retirement; there might also be a certain amount of retrenchment in other items of the Estimates; but, on the whole, when they compared the difference of wages and prices of articles of all sorts in this country with those abroad, he did not think our Estimates compared unfavourably with those of other countries. At the same time, he thought it quite possible there might be fair ground of complaint arising from the extra £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 now added to the Estimates, and the comparatively small return we had for them. He would not now go into the very intricate questions of purchase and promotion, which would require immense consideration before a proper determination could be arrived at. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Motion.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he was anxious not to give a silent vote on this occasion, because, although he would yield to no one in his claims to be considered an Army reformer, he could not flatter himself that he belonged to the number of those whom the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had classed under his plural "we." The question was, whether they should vote for the Resolution which had been placed on the Paper. That Resolution appeared to resolve itself into two parts, which were totally incompatible with each other. One was a Resolution—which the hon. Member had a perfect right to bring forward if he chose, and to which he had devoted the greater part of his speech—that it was desirable to alter the tenure of the office of Commander-in-Chief—a proposition to which he (Viscount Bury) hoped the House would give a distinct negative. The next appeared to be a Resolution of a totally abstract nature, affirming that certain circumstances he detailed called for the immediate removal of obsolete and antiquated sources of military expenditure. He (Viscount Bury) quite agreed that if any such could be shown to exist they ought to be removed, and he was quite ready to vote for their removal. He thought it was hardly dealing fairly by the House to tack to such an important Motion as one dealing with the tenure of the office of Commander-in-Chief an abstract declaration with respect to another matter. It would be scarcely possible, if they devoted not only the present evening, but three or four succeeding evenings to the discussion, to deal with all the various topics touched on and mixed up together in a most extraordinary way by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs. The hon. Member had evidently some grudge—he would not say a personal grudge—but a grudge against the office of the Commander-in-Chief in respect to the mode of conducting the business, and he mixed up together the system of promotion from the ranks, the removal of bad characters from the Army, the enormous military expenditure, and a variety of other subjects, and making the Commander-in-Chief, of all persons, responsible for everything, he called upon the House to vote for an alteration of the tenure of the Commander-in-Chief's office. The hon. Member's speech put him in mind of the lines—

"Who makes the quartern loaf and Luddites rise?
Who fills the butchers' shops with large blue flies?"

In like manner the hon. Member put the question, who was responsible for the various matters he had adverted to? and replied that it was the Commander-in-Chief, and, therefore, he said, the office should be abolished. One reason given for the proposed abolition was because, as the hon. Gentleman stated, His Royal Highness had expressed himself adverse to the principle of selection in respect to promotion—a principle which must be resorted to on the abolition of the purchase system, and must be conducted by the officer commanding the Army for the time being. He was not going to prejudge the plan on which they would shortly have to decide; but the hon. Gentleman was so enamoured of his own scheme that he had prejudged the question, having quite taken it for granted that the alteration would take place, that selection would follow, and that His Royal Highness must be removed. He argued in a vicious circle. Undoubtedly the proposals for Army organization proceeded from one of the most powerful Ministries which had existed of late years, and though they probably would be carried substantially, yet no one knew what form they would assume before the Bill passed through the mill of a Committee of the Whole House. No doubt, many hon. Members would support the proposals of the hon. Member; but no one could say how far either the original proposals of the Government or those of the hon. Member might be modified by subsequent experience and debate. Therefore, when the hon. Member stated that the principle of selection could not, in the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief, be carried out in its entirety, it was quite obvious that the hon. Member thought that the Commander-in-Chief was unwilling to carry out many of the details proposed by the Secretary of State. That was not fair to the Commander-in-Chief. In the course of his remarks, the hon. Member said that he thought the office held by the Commander-in-Chief ought to be held for five years only, and he went through a list of the officers who had held the post in order to prove that, under the present system, only Royal Dukes or "officers of classical reputation" could be appointed. He (Viscount Bury) had been somewhat puzzled to conceive what was meant by the phrase, "officers of classical reputation"—more especially as the hon. Gentleman immediately afterwards said that if his system were adopted they would have the selection for the office the ablest officers of the Army. If that were so they would be officers of "classical reputation." He (Viscount Bury) failed to discover what distinction the hon. Gentleman could draw between his description of two of the ablest men in the Army—Lord Hardinge, whom he did praise, and the Duke of Wellington, whom he did not praise. The hon.

Viscount Bury

Member likewise observed that the Duke of Wellington retained the office until he became so rooted and grounded in his prejudices as to refuse to move forward. In illustration of that statement—and he thought a very unhappy illustration—the hon. Member gave as an instance a dispute between Lord Grey and the Duke of Wellington, respecting the abolition of corporal punishment, the result of which was in favour of the Secretary of State and not of the Duke of Wellington; so that the illustration proved that, instead of the Commander-in-Chief overriding the Secretary of State, the Commander-in-Chief showed himself subordinate to the Secretary of State. Was it not the case, too, that His Royal Highness the present Commander-in-Chief considered himself subordinate to the Secretary of State? His Royal Highness had taken every public opportunity to declare that he was directly subordinate to the Secretary of War. It could not, then, be on the ground of want of subordination that certain Army reformers wished to get rid of the present holder of the office of Commander-in-Chief. Was his removal desired on account of any alleged incapacity? Why, it was well known—as had been stated that evening by the Financial Secretary for War (Captain Vivian)—that the Commander-in-Chief, on every occasion when he had given his evidence before a Committee or a military Commission, or made a public speech on military matters, had shown himself most minutely acquainted with all the details of Army organization, and proved that he knew more about them than any other officer in the Army. But it was said that His Royal Highness was unwilling to march with the times, and that he was as much rooted and grounded in prejudices as the late Duke of Wellington. Why, only a short time ago, when His Royal Highness was addressing a public meeting, he expressed his astonishment that he should have been so freely designated as a person desirous of remaining in the old, antiquated grooves, and disinclined to go forward with the times, and His Royal Highness declared that he rather wished to head military officers in the path of progress than to drag them back. Indeed, during the time His Royal Highness had held his present office, everyone must have seen that he had always acted up to that profession. The difficulty of regulating promotion by selection, if purchase should be abolished, whether the system were carried out by His Royal Highness or any other officer, must be great, and he did not believe that any officer would be able to stand for six months the odium which he would incur by conducting the system of selection. Indeed, he believed the system to be a vicious one, for this reason—that the Commander-in-Chief could not possibly select in every case from his own personal knowledge, and, therefore, the man most likely to get on under that system would be the man who had the best means for making his claims known. The House was told that that would be regulated by public opinion—that was to say, any officer who felt himself aggrieved or passed over would find no difficulty in getting his case brought before the House. Therefore, there would be a perpetual state of antagonism, more or less distinctly declared, between unofficial opinion in that House and officers at the head of the Army. That he regarded as one of the greatest difficulties with which they would have to deal when the principle of selection came into play. The hon. Member said in effect that an officer, remaining for years at the head of affairs of the Army, and being practically irremovable, acquired such an intimate knowledge of the details of the Army and of Army organization, that the Secretary of State could not cope with him. Now, if that argument meant anything it meant this—that because the Secretary of State was ignorant, therefore they were to select an officer who should be more ignorant than the Secretary of State. The hon. Gentleman's argument was that a civilian Secretary of State could not have the knowledge of Army affairs which was possessed by an officer who had been long at the head of the Army, and that, because the Secretary of State could not enforce due subordination on the part of the Commander-in-Chief, they must abolish the Commander-in-Chief altogether, and appoint an adjutant-general. The Secretary of State must surely say—"Defend me from my friends" when the hon. Member, in the interest of the Secretary of State, advocated that his ignorance should be protected by the abolition of an officer who knew more than he did. He would not deal with the latter half of the hon. Gentleman's Resolution. He had dealt with that question, which was the practical issue—whether the tenure of the Commander-in-Chief should be abolished. On that question he was entirely against the hon. Gentleman. On obsolete and antiquated items of military expenditure, that was not the time to express any opinion. The Financial Secretary of the War Department had told them that many things had been maturely deliberated by Her Majesty's Government, and that in due season they would be brought under the consideration of the House. When they were brought forward, he (Viscount Bury) would be ready to discuss them; but he would not be dragged, if he could help it, into the consideration of a series of abstract questions which had nothing to do with the practical question before them, and which ought not to be placed in the same category. He could not help thinking, while he listened to the hon. Member and his Secunder, that this was a Resolution on which the hon. Gentleman did not intend to divide, but that he meant it to be regarded as a general programme or syllabus of Army reform which he intended in the course of the Session to submit in detail to the House. Be that as it might, he (Viscount Bury) thought the House ought not to be led away by it, and that they should confine their attention that night to the distinct issue which the hon. Gentleman had brought before them—whether the tenure of the Commander-in-Chief ought to be altered.

COLONEL NORTH said, the misfortune of introducing and discussing such questions as this was that they became party questions, which they ought never to be made, for our Army was not a political institution, and he believed that there was no political party outside the House, and he was quite sure there was no political section in the House, who were not equally alive to the honour and the efficiency of our Army. He was happy to say that it had not hitherto been treated as a political and party question; but he could only say it would not be the fault of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) if it did not hereafter become one of the bitterest party feeling. Instead of going about the country delivering speeches and exciting the public mind, it would have been far better if the hon. Member had waited and calmly brought it forward, and had it fairly discussed in that House. All would agree that a question of this importance ought to be discussed with the greatest calmness and the greatest fairness, and when the hon. Gentleman found it necessary to refer to evidence which had been taken before Royal Commissions, and before Committees of the House, the real and true sense of that evidence ought to have been given without collecting three or four sentences to suit a particular purpose. He was very much surprised on reading a good deal of what the hon. Gentleman stated in his speeches at Edinburgh, Brighton, and Birmingham. As they had been revised, corrected, printed, and distributed to his friends by himself, and the public could buy them, the House had a right to hold the hon. Gentleman responsible for all that he had stated in those speeches. At the beginning the hon. Gentleman made an attack upon Army agents. He said—

“The Army agents alone received £40,000 a year from the public, not one halfpenny of which should be paid after the first of April next.”

The hon. Gentleman said—

“It was a painful thing to think that that job should have lasted through the second year of a householders’ Parliament, led by a Liberal Government.”

But the hon. Gentleman had forgotten that he was himself not only a Member of that householders’ Parliament, but a Member of that very Government; and that it was not until he had ceased to be a Member of that Government that he had attempted anything towards getting rid of what he thought so very objectionable. The hon. Gentleman served upon a Committee which sat three or four months. Their recommendations, he (Colonel North) believed, were approved by officers both of the Engineers and the Artillery; but nothing was done to carry them out, because they were so expensive. With regard to the question of selection, that His Royal Highness was not singular in his opinion could be proved from the reasons given by three Members of the Royal Commission, one of whom was Mr. Edward Ellice, who had been Secretary at War, for not agreeing with the Report of the other Members. Lord Grey was also of the same opinion. So far from the Duke of Cambridge refusing to select, as stated by Mr. Trevelyan, His Royal Highness, referring to the opinions laid before the Commission, said in a speech in the House of Lords on the Mutiny Bill, that, as far as he was personally concerned, it would be his earnest and anxious endeavour, difficult as it might be, and as he must consider it himself, to carry out whatever decisions might be come to in such a manner as to promote the best interests of the Army, and, if of the Army, the best interests of the country also. His Royal Highness asked what were to be the standards of merit; and they all recollected the speech of Lord Palmerston on the same subject. Lord Palmerston asked—“What is merit?” And he went on to say that merit was only the opinion which one man formed of another, and that it would be an Utopian idea to hope that under any system individuals could be selected for merit alone. But not only was Lord Palmerston, but General Peel, Lord Herbert of Lea, Sir George Lewis, Mr. E. Ellice, Lord Grey, Lord Raglan, and Sir Charles Yorke were all against selection. So eager, however, was the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) to get rid of His Royal Highness that he was not satisfied with removing him from the Horse Guards without removing him from the Army. [“No, no!”] In his speech at Liverpool, on the 6th of January, the hon. Gentleman said—“When they had abolished the purchase system, how would they keep it from reviving? It would immediately revive if they kept the Duke of Cambridge in the Army.” [MR. TREVELYAN: I meant the Horse Guards, not the Army.] It was not in the power of the Secretary of State to transfer an officer of the Line to the Militia, and he hoped under the new system neither Secretary of State nor Commander-in-Chief would be able to move an officer who might be senior of his rank in the regular Army to similar rank in the Militia. We could never require to use officers of the Army to officer the Militia. There were plenty of officers on half-pay who would be content to serve, provided their interests were properly considered. The hon. Gentleman had also referred to General Forster, the Military Secretary, and stated the evidence of Sir Edward Lugard relative to the duties that officer was called upon to perform; but his remarks by no means conveyed the true evidence given by that gallant officer. The Military Secretary was, in truth, a most important officer, whose duty it was to lay before His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief statements as to different officers who stood on the list for promotion, it remaining for His Royal Highness to select those officers with the approval of the Secretary of State. He could not also help thinking that the cause which the hon. Gentleman had espoused required a good deal of bolstering up when he found it necessary to select whatever was useful to his own arguments, and put aside the rest. The hon. Gentleman was bound to give a fair and just summary of any evidence he thought to bear upon the subject, and not take merely as much as served his purpose; and when he attempted to cry up the Artillery and Engineers to the detriment of the rest of the Army he must tell the hon. Gentleman that if he thought it would be grateful to one branch of the service to be praised at the expense of another, he was labouring under a great mistake. The hon. Gentleman, too, had spoken in a most improper manner of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief—[“No, no!”]—in a speech which he had made in 1869, and, recollecting the apology which he had to make in consequence of that speech, he was surprised that he should venture to repeat such statements again.

MR. O'REILLY said, that while he agreed with his hon. Friend who had raised the present discussion (Mr. Trevelyan) that there were many sources of expenditure connected with the Army which were antiquated and useless, he did not think there was sufficient ground for recording on the Votes of the House such a general sweeping declaration with respect to them as that which was contained in his Resolution. Of the payments to Army agents, he saw the final extinction “looming in the distance.” The extra payments, too, in certain branches of our establishments, such as the Guards and Household Cavalry, would have an entirely new light thrown upon them when the system of purchase was abolished. He was prepared to admit at once—and he thought his right hon. Friend at the head of the War Office would admit—that if there was to be a separate rate of pay in different portions of the Army, it must be based either on the score of higher service, or on a more careful selection of the recipients. That, however, was a question which could not be considered abstractedly at the present moment. With regard to the third class of items, relating to the number of generals, sinecure colonelcies, and the whole of the half-pay list, it was essential, in his opinion, that his right hon. Friend should take them into his consideration hereafter. His (Mr. O'Reilly's) view was, that they must all be taken into account in connection with the scheme of retirement which must follow the abolition of the system of purchase. He now came to the more precise and definite part of his hon. Friend's Resolution—that which related to the tenure of office by the Commander-in-Chief, and the interpretation of which he must take to be that the five years' rule should be applied to the office of Commander-in-Chief, as well as to other posts in the Army. Now, he should state very briefly the reasons which led him to the conclusion that it was not desirable such a change should be made. The Secretary for War, in speaking the other night on the principle of promotion which should be adopted, said that one thing must be guarded against, and that was, that promotion should not be vested in the hands of a political chief—implying that the selection must be vested in the responsible head of the Army. That being so, would the affairs of the Army be best administered by such a head, removable every five years? There were, as far as he undertood the matter, two patent objections to such a state of things. In the first place, an officer thus removable would not have a sufficiently long time to make himself acquainted with the records of the Army on which his selections must be based; and, secondly, if the military head of the Army was to be chosen by its political head every five years, was there no danger that political reasons might influence his choice? Was it not better, therefore, that there should be such permanency in the office as should free its holder from the suspicion of having been appointed on political grounds? Would not a Liberal Secretary of State be inclined to replace from his own party a chief of the Army for one who had been appointed by a Conservative Secretary five years before? He (Mr. O'Reilly) thought it would be well if the Commander-in-Chief were compelled to retire at a fixed age—that would, he thought, be a far better remedy for the evil complained of than a compulsory retirement at the end of five years. As to the part of his hon. Friend's speech which was directed to the qualifications of the present Commander-in-Chief, he must say that, so far as he could see, he had made no observation which it was not perfectly competent to any Member of the House to make. But he must observe, without entering into any lengthened criticism of the high qualities which had been displayed in the office by His Royal Highness, that he believed he had given great satisfaction to the Army; and as to the allegation that he shirked the responsibility of the selection of officers, he would simply remark that he did not think he was the less qualified to discharge a difficult and honourable duty because he recognized its difficulties beforehand. His hon. Friend had gone on to observe that there was danger in abolishing the purchase system while we had at the head of the Army a Commander-in-Chief who had avowed that he held his high office in official ignorance of over-regulation prices, and who had stated that if it were abolished to-morrow a new system of purchase would be likely to spring up. Now, in making that statement, His Royal Highness spoke of a state of things which it was not proposed should continue to exist; while as to his official ignorance of over-regulation prices, his hon. Friend would seem to imagine that those prices had grown up under the administration of His Royal Highness, whereas he was in no sense of the word responsible for their existence; and if he was officially ignorant of them, so had been every Commander-in-Chief and Secretary of State who had preceded him in office. For the reasons which he had given he hoped his hon. Friend would not go to a Division; but if he should do so, he must, however reluctantly, vote against his Resolution.

MAJOR DICKSON said, he wished to warn the House and the country against the danger of putting too great faith in the specious speech of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). Like many military reformers who had no practical knowledge, he had drawn many theoretical conclusions, advocating the abolition of systems of the working of which he had no experience, and the introduction of foreign systems

—entirely overlooking the difference in the character of English and foreign soldiers, as well as many minor matters which, to a civilian, appeared trivial and unimportant, but the importance of which was fully appreciated by soldiers. With a confidence which might easily impose upon civilians, the hon. Member had spoken in favour of abolishing two systems which had always worked well, and had never broken down—our regimental system and the Department of the Horse Guards. The Commander-in-Chief had always performed his duty to the satisfaction of the Army, and, as he believed, of the country generally. The hon. Member had not, however, made any distinct charge against the Horse Guards, though he had heaped up against it many vague charges, which were, in fact, the shortcomings of the War Office, and ought to lead him to advocate a reform of that Department, not of the Horse Guards. As a soldier he could not protest too strongly against any change which would impair the efficiency of the regimental system, or transfer the control of the Army from a high military officer to a political official or a Board of military officers. Were the Gentlemen who advocated such a change so enamoured of the Admiralty that they wished to see a similar organization to that of the Admiralty? At present the Army had confidence in the administration of military patronage; but if this patronage were once transferred to a political department, political jobbery and favouritism would creep into the administration, and would give rise to discontent and distrust throughout the Army. He contended that the system of selection would strike a fatal blow at that esprit de corps which had led to such happy results in the past, and he felt convinced that there could be no safe rule for promotion but seniority pure and simple. To that it was objected that it would lead to the appointment of incompetent men at the head of regiments and that a short time would witness the re-introduction of the purchase system in another form. He would, however, ask whether there was no possibility of framing penal regulations, and whether there was not a Government sufficiently strong to carry them out? Was it not possible to establish a system that if any officer was reported incompetent, and this should be clearly established on investigation, he should be called upon to resign? He agreed in the remark made by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) that military matters ought not to be made the subject of political agitation; but there could be no doubt that for some months past certain Gentlemen had been going up and down the country keeping up a political agitation, and he would put it to the good sense of the House, and of military reformers out-of-doors, whether it was not dangerous to carry on an agitation which might ultimately reach the Army itself, and utterly destroy that cheerful confidence which now existed in all ranks of Her Majesty's Service.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, he did not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) in his desire to limit the tenure of the officer Commanding-in-Chief. He believed that the removal of the Department from the Horse Guards to the War Office would give to the public that security that was desired, and would lead to increased economy. And it was his opinion that that economy was sorely needed in Pall Mall. He thought that the administration at the Horse Guards was anything but economical, for in addition to the figures enumerated by his hon. Friend who introduced the Motion, he might observe that whereas in 1853-4 the Estimate for the Horse Guards was £26,000, it had now increased to over £49,000. These figures would afford a convincing proof that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had little chance of effectually reducing the overburdened Estimates unless he commenced at the top. But he did not wish the present debate to anticipate the discussion on the Army Estimates. It was to be regretted that the debate partook somewhat of the nature of a personal attack upon His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief; but that was not the fault of the Mover of this Resolution, but rather the fault of the distinguished individual at present filling that office; for His Royal Highness had from time to time expressed himself adverse to the abolition of the purchase system, and had, before the Commission of 1857, over and over again declared himself unable to select officers for promotion. His Royal Highness prophesied, moreover, in the most solemn terms, that promotion by selection would resolve itself into promotion by seniority. If His Royal Highness had since changed his opinion, as they were told he lately had, so much the better for the service in which he was so deservedly loved and liked; but if he had not, he did not see how he could undertake those duties which it was proposed should be incidental to his office. He ventured, however, to submit that this was not a question whether this or that man should be appointed to the office of Commander-in-Chief, but whether it was to the advantage of the Army or the nation that the appointment to the office should be by selection, and should be periodically in the hands of the Secretary for War. He had in his hands a paragraph of the Report of a Select Committee which inquired into the relations which existed between the War Office and Horse Guards—a Committee over which the late Sir James Graham presided. With respect to the advisability of placing the patronage of the Army in the hands of a high military officer, the Committee thus reported—

“The Army is thus enabled to feel assured that the patronage of the Army as regards first commissions, and the ordinary promotions and appointments, other than those which are self-regulated by purchase or seniority, will not be distributed with a view to political objects, or to the necessities of successive Governments.”

But the case was stronger now, for the Government was about to give the officer Commanding-in-Chief new duties. He would have to select officers for promotion and for appointments, which would be no longer self-regulated by purchase or seniority. But, if the appointment of this high officer was to be placed every five years at the disposal of the Secretary of State for War, there would be some danger of running into the very danger which that House most wished to avoid. The appointment might be made for party purposes; at any rate you would never be able to eradicate from the minds of the officers of the Army the suspicion that the appointment might have been made for the purpose of serving the exigencies of party. Therefore, he contended that the office of the Commander-in-Chief should be a permanent appointment, but subject to the pleasure of the Queen and considerations affecting age. There was a great chance of effecting reductions in the Vote annually made for out-pensioners—a Vote which had attained its present proportions—upwards of £1,300,000—in consequence of our plan of enlisting men for such long periods of service that at their discharge they were utterly unfitted for all civilian occupation. A charge was also imposed upon the country for the prospective services of the pensioners, which, in many cases, were altogether worthless. The short-service system, however, when thoroughly worked, would do away with this source of expenditure. He was quite prepared to support the Motion for reduction when brought forward by the hon. Gentleman who had introduced this Motion; but the Motion itself he regarded as too vague in its terms. He hoped it would not be pressed to a Division.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he thought this subject would have been better brought forward in connection with the larger question of Army organization. That, unfortunately, was no new subject in Europe. The sad results had just shown themselves of a system of intendance worked not for the good of the service or of the country, but of the entourage surrounding the late Ruler of the French people. The Germans pursued a directly opposite system, for though the Princes of the blood took their full share of the dangers of the field, they avoided in their higher military appointments all considerations of aristocratic favour or Court influence, and the results showed themselves in the successes they had won. The hon. and gallant Member for Dover (Major Dickson) had taunted civilian Members with talking about military matters which they did not understand, and seemed to regard civilian interference in these debates somewhat as he, when a boy at school, regarded the efforts of a German professor to learn the art of swimming when in bed; but still the hon. and gallant Gentleman, though thus opposed to civilian interference, admitted that the Secretary of State for War, who was a civilian, under the existing system exercised controlling authority over the Commander-in-Chief and all the military men in the service. In the Army he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) believed this control was but nominal; but in the Navy, where it really existed, and where its Chief did not enjoy a perpetuity of tenure, they saw the results in their present Navy, which, he believed, was efficient enough to maintain its supremacy against the fleets of Europe and of America. As to land forces, battles were no longer won with gros bataillons, but with improved ordnance and more skilful handling. A crisis had arrived in our Army organization, and he would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite could they candidly say that they believed the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief was the proper person at this moment to be at the head of the Army? ["Yes, yes!"] Hon. Gentlemen had favoured him with an affirmative answer. He thought they would hardly have done so if they had been acquainted with some facts he would now bring to their attention. In 1857, before the Indian Mutiny broke out, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) ventured to call attention to the propriety of reviving two regiments of cavalry—the 5th Lancers and the 18th Hussars—whose names had long been omitted from the Army List. The Horse Guards insisted that this could not be done; but in three weeks' time it was done, nevertheless. Again, a Staff College had been created which was costing the country many thousands a year; yet not a man who passed through the Staff College was appointed from it, until he called attention to the subject in that House. How had the Horse Guards dealt with the regulation providing that no officer should hold a Staff appointment beyond five years? Why, it was disregarded by the Horse Guards. There were well-known cases of men who had been 18 and 22 years on the Staff. ["Oh, oh!"] Were not hon. Gentlemen familiar with the names of Gordon and Cunningham? How was all this done? and was His Royal Highness unaware of these facts? If so, he was unfit for his position; while if he did know of the circumstances he was setting the example of a breach of discipline. To say that the office of Commander-in-Chief was not a political appointment was to utter an absurdity. In former times a Royal Duke was at the head of the Army; and was the strong speech which was delivered by His Royal Highness the Duke of York against the Catholic claims forgotten—a speech so strong, and so partizan, that the Tory papers of that day said it ought to be printed in letters of gold? ["Oh!" and Question!"] This was the question; and if he were not heard inside the House he would be heard outside the House. It was idle to say that a Peer of Parliament, taking his place in the other House, and expressing his opinions upon the questions of the day as they arose, had not political views of his own, and was a non-political officer. Now that a vast amount of patronage was about to be transferred to this distinguished personage, plenty of soothing speeches were delivered in that House, and those Members were laughed at who wished to state their honest opinions. Before introducing their plan for the reorganization of the Army the Government ought to have considered what would be their future policy were they to maintain only a system of insular defence? or were they to defend treaty obligations, and maintain the old tradition that we were to be prepared for every eventuality? It was very doubtful, in his opinion, whether the industry and wealth of the country would submit with a good grace to pay the increased taxes rendered necessary by the new Army Estimates. It seemed to him that too many persons in the present day—including some of those whom he was now addressing—were too like Punch's bump-tious Englishman, who thought themselves the greatest and most influential people under the sun, until brought back to their senses when the Chancellor of the Exchequer stepped forward and said—"Mr. Giles, you will have to pay me 8*d.* in the pound income tax." Whatever might be said of the Irish people, they, at all events, often rose above considerations of material interest, and on a late memorable occasion would have given all they possessed to carry out an idea which was endeared to their country by old traditional associations. In conclusion, he said he could only support that portion of the Motion which related to the administration of the Army. [The hon. Member spoke amid much interruption.]

MR. OSBORNE: Whatever epithet may be applied to the speech of my hon. Friend who had just preceded me in this debate (Sir Patrick O'Brien), I scarcely think it will be considered to be one of a soothing nature. Indeed, it occurs to me that the further we go into this debate, the more we are practising the figure the hon. Gentleman alluded to, and are endeavouring to learn to swim by swimming in bed. While listening to the arguments brought forward in support of this floating Motion, I have been very much tempted to ask what has become of that band of bounding brothers of whom the hon. Gentleman who has introduced the present Motion is a type. One after another I see them rising in their places and saying that they perfectly agree with the hon. Gentleman, but begging him not to go to a Division. One only has been true to the cause. Faithful among the faithless, my hon. Friend (Sir Patrick O'Brien), who had roved from New York to Vienna, and back again to the streets of Dublin, is the only one who said he would support the Motion; but he does not give any reason for supporting it, except that the 5th Lancers and the 18th Royal Dragoons were disbanded on account of the Horse Guards refusing to re-raise them. I must say that having entered the House late, and not being fully aware of what was coming on, I thought there was some mistake. I was under the impression, until I saw you, Mr. Speaker, in the Chair, that you ought not to have been sitting there, but that the Chairman of Committees should have been presiding, and that the discussion was on the Army Estimates. I have heard very little—indeed nothing—about the dual government, but I have heard a flaming attack made upon His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge for reasons which I can neither understand nor approve. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), and the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Dover (Major Dickson), have, I think, been rather hard upon, and have not made sufficient allowances for, the position of my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs. He is a rising young man, of extraordinary ability, extraordinary energy, and extraordinary industry. He took up this question of Army Reform, the abrogation of purchase, and the abolition of the Horse Guards. While "starring" it in the provinces he made the same able speech he has delivered this evening. I am able to compliment him upon it, as I have read it on three previous occasions. ["No, no!"] My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Winterbotham), is not such a studier of the provincial papers as I am. I have even read his letters from abroad. If my hon. Friend will get the Edinburgh Courant for December last I think he will find that identical speech. He will also find it in the Manchester Guardian. I repeat that I have carefully studied the provincial papers, and seen all these charges going from Edinburgh to Manchester, from Manchester to Liverpool, and, finally, cropping up at Birmingham. I read his speech, too, at Nottingham; and I think, therefore, the hon. Gentleman has been hardly treated. Well, this industrious young man joins the Ministry. He found that the Secretary for War last year did not hold out any very great hope of reform in the Army; consequently, this industrious and able young man leaves the Government. This was very creditable to him; but it must naturally have been a great disappointment for him, after he had made this great sacrifice and "starred it" in the provinces, to find that his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War had, without any previous information, taken the wind out of his sails, by coming forward with a proposal to bring forward all these reforms to abrogate purchase and to destroy the dual government, besides promising a great many other reforms. What does the hon. Member for the Border Burghs want? It is very hard for him to find these questions settled by the Secretary for War. What is he to do? Just let me ask hon. Gentlemen one thing. While we are all gaping at and admiring this great scheme for the abolition of purchase—on which I shall have something to say when the proper time arrives—are we prepared for the enormous outlay that it will render necessary? The sum at present named is £8,000,000. Now, I do not want to prophesy, but if the House of Commons gets out of it under £12,000,000, and £500,000 by way of a retiring list, I am very much mistaken. I do not wish, however, to debate this subject on a Motion as to whether the Duke of Cambridge is to be turned out of the Horse Guards. We shall have time enough to take it up on another occasion. This has degenerated into nothing more than an Army Estimate debate. If I accuse my hon. Friend who initiated it of having made the same speech in four places before, assuredly I have heard the same speech from his Seconder, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson); and certainly he had a much larger congregation to-night than he had on the occasion I allude to. I have been always particularly anxious to hear what falls from that hon. Gentleman, because he is essentially a representative man; and I congratulate him upon having made exactly the same speech he did when he attempted last year to cut down the Vote for the Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief. However, I want to come to the question. My hon. Friend the Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien), like a gallant and eloquent Irishman as he is, has taken the bull by the horns. He asks—"Is there a man in the House who will say that His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is the proper man to be Commander-in-Chief?" I am the man who says that. I believe a more honest and conscientious man, and a man better fitted for the post, never presided at the Horse Guards. My hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) brings forward trumpery instances of his having proposed Motions in a thin House. I dare say His Royal Highness was never aware that these Motions were made. What I complain of is that the hon. Member now, as then, proposes Resolutions which only nibble at the question—he does not go to the root of it. He endeavours to raise a cloud around the Horse Guards; he talks of purchase, Army agents, flogging, marking with the letter D, and contagious diseases. He puts all these together, and he endeavours to saddle the Duke of Cambridge with this olla podrida. What has the Duke to do with it? I protest against making the Commander-in-Chief the object of all this abuse. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War is the man who accepts all responsibility; if purchase has not been done away with before, it is not the Commander-in-Chief who is to blame—it is this House that is to blame for it; it is those new lights who have been made the victim of the petty larceny which has occurred, and whose pocket has been picked of their scheme. I heartily sympathize with the hon. Member, but as an old soldier who has seen something of the Army and its working, I say boldly that I believe there never was a man who was more conscientious in his appointments than the Royal Duke, and that he never condescended to a dirty thing or job. There is as much slavishness in abusing the Royal Duke as there may be courage in praising him. I have been very much struck with some of the instances the hon. Member for the Border Burghs has been perpetually giving the natives in the provinces, where they have always been received with enormous cheers. He cut that joke about Lord Hardinge at Birmingham. [Mr. TREVELYAN: I did not.] Then it was at Edinburgh. I suppose he could not have selected a more unfortunate instance than that of Lord Hardinge, who succeeded to the Horse Guards when it was known that the supply of artillery in this country was disgracefully deficient, and by the exertions of Lord Hardinge the country was put in a better state of defence than it had ever been in before. What I complain of is this—that the hon. Member has not spoken to this House as he has spoken to assemblies at Birmingham and elsewhere. [Mr. TREVELYAN made a gesture of denial.] No, he has not. The hon. Gentleman selects one man from among many, and he says—“You have got into a groove. Here is Sir Richard Airey who is perpetually employed.” And why is he? Because, I suppose, he is one of the ablest officers this country has possessed; and if anything awkward arose on the Continent I suppose it very probable there is no man we should sooner place at the head of an Army than Sir Richard Airey. I have been an Army reformer in my time, and I am still an Army reformer. I have turned the Serpentine through the Horse Guards with greater success than the hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Rylands) has turned it through the Foreign Office—by one of my first essays in Parliament I reduced flogging in the Army, therefore I feel I have some right to speak on this subject. However Parliament may interfere with the Estimates, as it properly may, I hope we may not get a more expensive Army—though I fear we shall; but if there is one thing I should deprecate more than another—if there is one thing I hope Parliament will never do—it is the taking the command of the British Army from the Horse Guards.

MR. CARDWELL: I shall be glad if any words of mine shall induce my hon. Friend not to press his Motion to a Division; for if he take a Division, he will do so on a point on which he does not carry the House with him. From the tone of his speech, I think his Motion was intended not so much to be levelled personally against His Royal Highness, the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief as to raise the question of the tenure of that office. I shall feel it my duty to say a few words on both these points. With regard to the tenure of the office, I wish to say that a few years ago there was an exceptional warrant of the Secretary of State for War which removed the discipline of the Army, the appointments, and the promotions from the control of the Commander-in-Chief. A few years ago that exceptional warrant was withdrawn, and the matter remained without any clear and satisfactory arrangement until last year, when, by an Order of the Queen in Council, it was placed beyond doubt. Dual government cannot be said to have had any existence since that Order was passed; and we are now moving the Horse Guards to the War Office in Pall Mall, in order to obtain that greater convenience of administration which all Secretaries of State, from General Peel to the present time, have pointed out to be necessary, which Sir James Graham's Committee so strongly recommended, and which the Duke of Cambridge agrees with me in recommending to this House. By the Motion before the House—to which I shall confine myself—my hon. Friend asks that the tenure of the Commander-in-Chief should be altered in such a manner as to enable the Secretary of State for War to avail himself of the best administrative talent; and he explains that by saying he wishes to have the five years' rule, which applies to all other Staff officers, applied to His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. There cannot be anything more deceptive than to pursue an analogy where the reason does not hold. In all other Staff appointments, as has been justly pointed out, the selection is made by a professional officer, by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief—by a person who has no connection with politics. Now, if there is one thing which would be more mischievous than another, it would be to have the smallest suspicion of politics introduced into this office. You have a most difficult problem to solve, because you justly hold the political officer who sits here responsible to you for the approval of the appointments; and, at the same time, you justly determine that these appointments shall not be made by a political officer. That is an extremely difficult problem to solve, and you solve it by taking care to hold high the just authority of the military officer who is at the head of the Army, while, on the other, you hold high the responsibility of the Secretary of State. But if you make the appointment of the Commander-in-Chief terminable at the end of a fixed period, you would, in my opinion, greatly impair and disparage the just authority which ought to belong to that office. Let us consider it in two ways. The appointment might be made either for too long a period or for too short a one. Suppose you had got, by misfortune or by accident, in that high place an officer who really was not competent for it—and the hon. Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) put this point in a thinner House with perfect clearness—would you, because he had a five years' appointment, desire to continue him in the office to the end of the five years? Quite the reverse; you would justly hold the Minister of the day responsible for bringing his appointment to a close. On the other hand, my hon. Friend spoke in disparagement of the Duke of Wellington as Commander-in-Chief; but if such a man as the Duke of Wellington were in the office, would anybody propose to substitute any other person for him? Suppose the eminent man who has so successfully commanded the German Armies were at the head of our Army, would anybody propose that, at the end of five years, he should terminate his office? Therefore, Sir, with regard to tenure, I hold that the office of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief is distinguished from every other Staff appointment by essential differences, and that the continuance of anyone in it, or his removal from it, must depend upon considerations of public expediency and advantage. Therefore I hold my hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) is mistaken in the Motion he makes, and I regret very much if, by persevering in it, he compels us to go into a different Lobby from him, as he is doing so much to support our general proposals. But I must also say a word or two on the ground he took for the proposals he makes with regard to the Commander-in-Chief, in the evidence of the Duke of Cambridge before the Committee of

1857. It would be very severe discipline to be applied to any of us if, in practical matters of this kind, we were to be bound by opinions we may have expressed some 14 years ago. Public opinion marches gradually, sometimes rapidly, and carries us along with it. The illustrious Duke was not the only person who, in 1857, entertained opinions adverse to the abolition of purchase; the Secretary of State of that day thought, under the circumstances, that abolition of purchase was not desirable; and why is the Duke of Cambridge to be held to the opinion he then entertained any more than the Secretary of State? It is admitted on all hands that he gave his evidence before the various Committees by whom he was examined with the utmost frankness. No doubt the opinions which were then placed on record were the opinions he then held; but he did not necessarily hold them for all subsequent time. I know perfectly well that what has recently passed on the subject of the abolition of purchase, and more especially the Report of the Commission over which my right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) presided, has had a material effect in influencing his judgment on the subject. At any rate the illustrious Duke has cordially assisted the Government in the preparation of their measures, and given us all the support and co-operation we could desire. Well, Sir, with regard to the constitution of the Horse Guards one important change is made. A great deal has been said about the Military Secretary—he has been spoken of as if he were the mere amanuensis of the Commander-in-Chief. But the office of Military Secretary is one of very great importance, because he has to record and tabulate the reports of the general officers inspecting, which are the foundation of promotions in the higher ranks of the Army; and the office will be one of far greater importance if the proposed arrangements are carried into effect. It is only justice to General Foster, the Military Secretary, to say that, in speaking of higher duties, no reflection whatever is intended or thought of with regard to the mode in which the former duties were discharged. Then, Sir, upon the second part of the Motion of my hon. Friend I do not think I need enter at any length to-night—that would be only anticipation. Of course I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that, speaking generally, whatever is obsolete and antiquated ought to be the subject of criticism and removal. I understand the principal object of my hon. Friend is to change the tenure of the office of Commander-in-Chief. I do not understand him to desire at all to point observation against the individual who now happens to fill the high office, but only against the tenure of the office itself. I hope my hon. Friend will see that what I have said is true—that this is an office the duration of which ought not to be measured by mere lapse of time; questions of expediency must be taken into account, and the officer holding it should be in harmony with the Government, assisting and co-operating with them in carrying forward their measures; at the same time you ought to take every means in your power for preventing the patronage of the Army being mixed up with political questions, and holding up as high as possible the authority vested in him. I have listened with admiration to the ability my hon. Friend has displayed to-night. I trust that ability will never be exercised on merely personal matters; and I shall be glad if he will be satisfied with the success he has gained this evening, and will not press his Motion to a Division.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would not, after the kind attention the House had given him in the early part of the evening, say more than a very few words in reply. He thought a little too much had been made of the five years' tenure of office; if the Governor General of India could be appointed for that period, and the arrangement could work so satisfactorily for so many years, he (Mr. Trevelyan) did not think that the Commandership-in-Chief was an office so very high that it should be regulated differently. He asked for no single remedy to night; he merely wished the House to pronounce that the present tenure was disadvantageous. As for the observations of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne), he did not attach much importance to them. It mattered very little what speeches he had delivered in various parts of the country; but this, at least, he could say, that what he had stated he was not afraid to repeat in that House. He should have been glad to accede to the suggestion of his right hon. Friend who was doing so much for this question and for the Army; but having promised the country to divide the House, and conceiving that to be a more practical mode of giving effect to his opinions than to make jokes about them for 10 years, he should do so.

THE POPE—LETTER OF MR. GLADSTONE.—MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. W. JOHNSTON moved an Address to Her Majesty for Copies of the Letter from the right hon. the First Lord of the Treasury to the hon. Member for Queen's County, dated the 30th day of November, 1870, and for other Papers. The hon. Member said, that the contest between France and Prussia, following hard on the declaration of Papal Infallibility, had produced a state of affairs in Italy which caused some correspondence between the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and other persons who were anxious to ascertain the views of Government upon this important question. There was great anxiety felt in Ireland among the members of the Roman Catholic body on the subject. Meetings were held by them and addresses forwarded to the Prime Minister soliciting the Government on behalf of the Pope—and altogether the subject had assumed a character of sufficient importance to justify a demand for the Papers relating to it. The first portion of the Papers asked for comprised the correspondence between the First Lord of the Treasury and the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Dease). Under ordinary circumstances he of course should not have moved for these letters; they were not, however, in the nature of private correspondence; they comprised a letter from the Prime Minister of a great Protestant country pledging not only himself, but the whole of the Government, to a policy inconsistent with Protestant principles. An important reference was made to this subject by The Times correspondent at Florence on the 21st of December last, when, in commenting on a recently issued Green Book, he wrote—

"Another despatch of Signor Cadorna, dated the 27th of September, shows how well the chief of the English Foreign Office understood the situation of affairs in Italy, and how warmly he recommended the Italian Government to leave alone that unfortunate business of Roma Capitale. Though his advice with regard to the transfer of the capital is not accepted, he tries to persuade the Pope not to leave Rome. Mr. Otway, in a conversation he had with Signor Cadorna on the same day, seems to have insisted once more upon the necessity of postponing the transfer, and points out the difficulties the question produces in Ireland."

But this matter produced difficulties in other places besides Ireland. The letter of the right hon. Gentleman excited great interest in Edinburgh, where it was keenly felt that if the spiritual functions of the Pope were officially recognized by the Prime Minister, this country would not be adhering to the principles of the Reformation—because it was well understood that the spiritual functions of the Pope had ever been opposed to civil and religious liberty. The feeling was so strong in Scotland that the letter of the Prime Minister was an emphatic condemnation of the Reformation, that the matter was discussed at a meeting of the Edinburgh Free Church Presbytery on the 28th of December last. In the course of the discussion Dr. Candlish remarked that—

"Mr. Gladstone stated in his letter to him that at one time he intended to publish that letter (one to Dr. C.'s friend); but that, influenced by the advice of his colleagues, he had thought it better to abstain from publishing it at this time, and to wait till the meeting of Parliament, when he would be prepared to offer any explanation which any parties in the House might seem to require."

In conformity with that declaration he now asked for the letter, in order that the required explanation might be given. After this meeting a number of anxious inquirers on the Liberal side of the House met to consider the matter in Pall Mall; the consultation resulted in a letter to the Prime Minister, signed by the hon. Members for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) and Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers), dated the 6th of January. This letter was not replied to until the 19th; and then came a correspondence commencing with "My dear Gladstone" and "My dear Kinnaird," and when it was remembered that these two letters were dated on the same day, one was anxious to know where the correspondence was concocted, who suggested the conclusion, and how it came to be published. But surely the House should be put in possession of the facts when a Free Church Presbytery had been told the matter was capable of explanation, and the public generally had been assured that a private conversation in a certain house was eminently satisfactory to the distinguished Protestants who took part in it. It seemed, however, that the letter to the Prime Minister was repeated in substance in a despatch by Lord Kimberley to the Governor of Gibraltar, dated the 16th of January, 1871, in which he had said—

"Her Majesty's Government have not interfered in the civil affairs of the Roman States on the occasion of former events which have occurred during the reign of the present Pope, nor can they now so interfere; but the deep interest which is felt by many millions of Her Majesty's subjects, in common with the petitioners, in the position of the Pope renders all that concerns his personal dignity and independence, and freedom to exercise his spiritual functions, fit subjects for the notice of her Government, and they have not failed to take such steps as are in their power to afford to the Pope the means of security in case of need. Her Majesty desires me to state that this subject will continue to receive the careful attention of her Government, and that she has seen with much satisfaction the declaration of the Italian Government that the Pope's freedom and independence will be fully maintained, and due provision made for the support of his dignity."

Possibly the explanation to be offered by the Government would be satisfactory to the Protestants of England; but, however that might be, it was eminently satisfactory to the Vicar Apostolic of Gibraltar, who writes as follows:—

"Her Majesty's Royal goodness, as well as the kind notice taken by Government of the Holy Father's cause, and the formal recognition set forth in Earl Kimberley's despatch of 'the deep interest felt by many millions of Her Majesty's subjects, in common with the petitioners, in the position of the Pope,' lead me to entertain every confidence that Ministers will never be satisfied that the liberty and independence of our supreme spiritual chief be left to rest on the sole security of the Italian Parliament and Government, whose policy does not offer sufficient guarantee for the future."

Thus Her Majesty's Government had at the same time satisfied the Vicar Apostolic of Gibraltar, and Dr. Candlish, of the Edinburgh Free Church Presbytery. Under those circumstances he trusted the Government would not refuse these Papers, nor the House be induced to treat the matter lightly; for the policy indicated in the letter of the Prime Minister was certainly "inconsistent" in the words of the Bill of Rights "with the safety and welfare of this Protestant kingdom." The hon. Member then moved the Address for Papers.

MR. MILLER, in seconding the Motion, said, that the question had excited great interest in the constituency he represented, and he thanked the hon. Member for Belfast for having brought it forward. He attached the greatest importance to the production of the correspondence between the Foreign Secretary and the British Diplomatic Agent at Rome.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Letter from the Right honourable the First Lord of the Treasury to the honourable Member for Queen's County, dated the 30th day of November 1870, in which reference is made to 'the Sovereign Pontiff;' and it is declared that 'Her Majesty's Government consider all that relates to the adequate support of the dignity of the Pope, and to his personal freedom and independence in the discharge of his spiritual functions to be legitimate matter for their notice:'

Of the Correspondence between the First Lord of the Treasury and the honourable Members for Perth and Marylebone, on the same subject:

Of Despatches of the Foreign Secretary to Foreign Governments, and of the Colonial Secretary to the Governors of Malta and Gibraltar, on the same subject:

And, of all Despatches from the British Diplomatic Agent resident in Rome since the 1st day of August 1870."—(Mr. William Johnston.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnston) has framed his Motion in such a manner as makes it impossible for the Government to agree to it as it stands. The hon. Member has combined a great many matters in his Motion, to some of which I do not object, but to others of them I cannot agree. But before dealing with it I will state the position the Government assumes with regard to the question. With respect to the letter to Mr. Dease, the Government adhere to the proposition it contains. The Government do not, as the hon. Member has stated, wish to have the spiritual functions of the Pope recognized or meddled with by us in any way; but the Government believe that the liberty of the head of the religion of many millions of our fellow-subjects—his liberty and personal independence—is a legitimate matter for the notice of this Government. That is the proposition we maintain and that we mean to adhere to; if the hon. Member thinks that a proposition dangerous to the principle of the Reformation, all I can say is that the principles of the Reformation must be more limited than most Protestants commonly believe them to be. If my language, through its looseness, has scandalized the conscience of the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member, I should be glad to remove that difficulty. The Motion consists of no fewer than five branches. First, it asks for the production of the letter from the First Lord of the Treasury to Mr. Dease; then for the correspondence between the First Lord of the Treasury and the hon. Members for Perth and Marylebone; thirdly, for the Despatches of the Foreign Secretary to foreign Governments; fourthly, for the Despatches of the Colonial Secretary to the Governors of Malta and Gibraltar, on the same subject; and, fifthly, for all Despatches from the British Diplomatic Agent resident in Rome since the 1st of August, 1870. Now, the Government have prepared and directed to be laid on the Table of the House Papers on the Italian question; and I think the hon. Gentleman would have exercised a sound discretion, these Papers being actually on the Table, or, certainly, on the very point of being laid on the Table, if he had waited a little to see what they contained. We could not accede to a Motion for the production "of all Despatches from the British Diplomatic Agent resident in Rome" since the 1st of August, 1870. That is not the manner in which the House usually deals with a Motion for such Papers. It has been the custom of the House to leave to the Government a discretion as to those despatches which it may be advisable to lay before Parliament, and as to those other despatches, or portions of them, which it may be advisable to withhold. If the object of the hon. Gentleman is—as I daresay it is—to question the matter of this correspondence, I think he can obtain that object in a very simple manner by moving a portion of his Motion to which I know of no objection—namely, for the production of the Despatches of the Colonial Secretary to the Governors of Malta and Gibraltar. These are regular official documents, and if he likes to move for them he is perfectly welcome to them as far as I am concerned, and they will give him the language of the Government in an authentic form. With regard to producing "all Despatches from the British Diplomatic Agent resident at Rome," as we have laid the Italian Papers on the Table, I do not think the hon. Gentleman should endeavour to force on the House such a sweeping Motion at the present moment. Let him exercise his discretion as to that point afterwards. With respect to the first part of the Motion, I think, in the first place, it is unnecessary; the hon. Gentleman is in possession of those Papers, inasmuch as he recites a portion of them in his Motion. On the other hand, I feel considerable difficulty in acceding to a proposal which I think would form a bad precedent. The hon. Member proposes to convert into official documents, to be produced in this House, a correspondence between a Minister and certain Members of this House. This is not a proceeding which the House would do well to establish as a precedent without very careful consideration. It often happens that a Member of this House may write to a public Office on a matter of public interest and may receive an answer that is afterwards published in the newspapers. That sometimes occurs. But I doubt whether it is desirable, without laying down any rule for its limitation, to establish a practice of converting such letters into official Papers. The hon. Gentleman should not suppose it is necessary that everything should be made an official Paper of and laid on the Table in order that it may be animadverted upon in the House. In this case there is no difficulty whatever in his making such animadversions, because the Papers are on the Table, which he regards as the corpus delicti. But on account of my objection to laying down a precedent for calling for the production, as official documents, of all correspondence that may pass between Members of this House and a Minister, and which may subsequently be published in the newspapers, I am very sorry that I cannot agree to this Motion as it stands.

MR. GREENE said, he thought the House had a right to the production of the Papers referred to in that Motion; but he confessed he did not lay much stress on the correspondence between the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) and the Prime Minister. They could all see that the hon. Gentleman had come to the rescue of his right hon. Friend; for when he first read the Prime Minister's letter he could not have thought that a man of his acuteness could ever have committed such words to paper; nor was he singular in that opinion, for the matter had caused the greatest sensation in Scotland. The Prime Minister declared that—

"Her Majesty's Government consider all that relates to the adequate support of the dignity of the Pope, and to his personal freedom and independence in the discharge of his spiritual functions to be legitimate matter for their notice."

He would ask the right hon. Gentleman how far he thought that interference might be legitimately carried? If they were to interfere at all in a matter that did not concern this country—supposing the independence of the Pope to be affected, was their interference to be backed up by nothing more than moral force? The people of this country stood in doubt as to the intentions of the Government on this matter, and felt they ought to have a direct answer as to whether we had anything to do with the Pope or no. Surely they could leave the Pope very well to take care of himself. He trusted there were still some Members of the Liberal party left who would adhere to the Protestant feeling of the country. This country did not interfere with the liberty of the Pope, nor ought it to be called upon to defend that liberty, if it should be in danger, from any foreign Power. He regretted that the subject had not been brought forward in a more definite form; but let the Government tell them plainly how far they meant to protect the Pope if his liberty or independency was in jeopardy.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I take a somewhat different view of this subject from that in which it has been treated; because, having been a Member of this House in 1848, I remember well the long discussions which took place at that time with regard to the proposal made for establishing relations with his Holiness the Pope. After lengthened debates in both Houses, it was decided that it would be impolitic and utterly inconsistent with the character of the Government of this country, that any relations whatever should be established between the Government of Her Majesty and the Pope in his spiritual capacity. This was decided after several Divisions. Objections to the Diplomatic Relations Bill, which was then introduced by the Government, were taken by the Duke of Wellington, one of the Ministers who promoted the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1829. I advert to this fact in order to show that the noble Duke could not be actuated by a spirit of intolerance; but that, on grounds of a recognized policy, as one of the Ministers who passed the Relief Act of 1829, he objected to the Bill introduced by the Liberal Government of that day, because it would have established relations between the Government of Her Majesty, whose only title to the Throne rested on the fact that she was the representative of a Protestant family, and the Pope in his capacity of Sovereign Pontiff. Lord Eglinton also moved and carried a clause in the House of Lords, to the effect that the future relations of the Government of Her Majesty with the Government of the Roman States should by law be limited to communication with the Pope in his temporal character only as Sovereign of the Pontifical States. That is now the law of the United Kingdom, and that law was passed for the express purpose of excluding the legalization of any relations between the Government of Her Majesty, as the Protestant Sovereign of these realms, and the Pope, as Sovereign Pontiff, by which description it was fully explained in debate, the Pope in his spiritual capacity was described. Now, Sir, we have had a pretty plain avowal from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that he considers it to be his duty to violate the intention of the law—because, according to that law, the ancient restrictions upon the action of the Government are clearly retained. I will not trouble the House with the quotation; but it is expressly recited in that Act that nothing therein contained shall be taken to justify any Prime Minister of this country in entering into any relations with the Pope in his spiritual capacity. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheers what I say. Let me ask him what business it is of his to support this spiritual authority at all?

MR. GLADSTONE: I said that we had no relations whatever with the spiritual functions of the Pope; that our business was, so far as it is declared here to be legitimate matter for our notice, with his freedom and independence in the exercise of them, but as nothing whatever to do with those spiritual functions.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The right hon. Gentleman's definition is so fine that really my blunt vision cannot perceive it. He says that he does nothing to violate the intentions of the Act of Parliament, because he does not enter into relations with the Pope in his spiritual capacity, and, at the same time, in answer to a Roman Catholic Member of this House, he writes that he considers it his duty to maintain the independence of the Pope in the exercise of those very spiritual functions. This was in answer to an application made to him, founded upon the fear that the Pope may be coerced in the exercise of his spiritual authority. Now, supposing that that fear were to be realized, which is the anticipation upon which all this proceeds, the right hon. Gentleman has engaged, he tells us, and intends to use the power of England in removing the hindrances to the free exercise of the spiritual authority of the Pope. [Mr. GLADSTONE: "No."] Well, Sir, had he not better give us the correspondence which will explain to us what he really means? Since, I can answer for it, that, at this moment, throughout the length and breadth of the United Kingdom, it is believed and understood that the engagement of the right hon. Gentleman extends to this—that, without the Pope's having sought the hospitality of England by going to Malta—a contingency which was contemplated by the late Lord Palmerston; for I put the question twice myself to him, and his reply will be found in The Standard, and that answer I commend to the study of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, who cheers me—the Prime Minister has pledged the honour of this country to maintain the independence of the Pope in his spiritual functions. I should be very glad if the replies given by the present Prime Minister were in the sense of Lord Palmerston; but the right hon. Gentleman says, and I will read his words to the House—

"That Her Majesty's Government consider all that relates to the adequate support of the dignity of the Pope, and to his personal freedom and independence in the discharge of his spiritual functions to be legitimate matter for their notice."

Well, Sir, that has been announced to all Europe, and the right hon. Gentleman is held now to stand in the position of having almost, if not quite, pledged the honour of this country to the maintenance of the Pope's independence in the exercise of his spiritual functions—those very functions with which the right hon. Gentleman is forbidden by law to interfere. I think that the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnston) has rendered a public service by asking for these Papers. I am confident of this—that no one who, like myself, remembers what took place in Parliament in 1847 and 1848, or who has carefully read the Diplomatic Relations Act as it stands in the statute book, can fail to see that, instead of limiting his interference to the offer of protection to the Sovereign Pontiff of the Roman States, in his temporal capacity and as a temporal Sovereign, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has distinctly transgressed the limits of the statute by undertaking to maintain the independence and the spiritual functions of the Pope. And, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman is about to frame some new statute to authorize his conduct, I trust that he will not fail to define the limits between the temporal and spiritual functions of the Pope; a task which, hitherto, has been too much for all the sagacity of the statesmen of Europe for centuries. The intention of the right hon. Gentleman is clearly this—to maintain the authority—the spiritual authority—of the Pope. Yes; that is the construction which plain Englishmen put upon this letter; and it is also the construction put upon it in another part of the United Kingdom—in Ireland. Sir, I am not surprised at the deep and earnest feeling which pervades the country on this subject, and I hope that the hon. Member for Belfast will press his Motion to a Division.

MR. W. H. GREGORY reminded the House that the question before them was not the spiritual power of the Pope, but simply whether certain Papers ought to be laid upon the Table. The House ought to bear in mind that the whole question would be brought under its consideration on Friday next, when the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) was brought forward. It was most unfair that, on an occasion like the present, when Ministers had no power to explain their language, statements should be made which would go before the country without explanation.

Mr. Gladstone

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I cannot agree with the statement of the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. W. H. Gregory), that the Motion to be brought on on Friday next has anything to do with the question now before the House. The two questions are entirely distinct. The Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly), which will be brought before the House on Friday next, involves the Italian question—that is to say, the manner in which Rome has been taken possession of by the King of Italy, and it has nothing to do with the one now before us, which is whether certain particular correspondence should be produced or not. We have heard the answer of the right hon. Gentleman; he takes an exception to certain portions of the Motion, which I think are well founded. The objection, however, that he makes to the production of a copy of his letter to the hon. Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Dease), on the ground that to produce it would be to make official correspondence between a Minister and a Member of this House, cannot, I think, be sustained. I can see no objection in principle to the production of this correspondence. The right hon. Gentleman has written a letter which has attracted great public notice, and which is of a nature that very much touches the feelings of a large portion of the population of this country and of a large section of the Members of this House; and it having merely been seen copied in a newspaper, a perfectly natural and fair desire has been expressed that this House should be put in possession of an official copy of that document, in order that they may be satisfied as to the actual character of a communication made by the Prime Minister to a Member of this House upon a subject of thorough importance and interest to the country. Under these circumstances, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider his decision in this matter. I cannot, however, help thinking that the hon. Member who brought this subject forward would do well, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, to limit his Motion to that part which relates to the production of the right hon. Gentleman's letter.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he would assent to the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet, and would merely press for the production of an official copy of the right hon. Gentleman's letter to Mr. Dease.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has called for certain Papers, to the production of which I do not think I should be justified in assenting; but, at the same time, I am desirous of concurring with him in an arrangement by which the substantial object of the Motion will be attained. I do not wish to be responsible for the establishment of a new precedent for the production of correspondence between a Minister and Members of this House; but if the hon. Member wishes merely to obtain an official copy of my letter, he can attain that object by providing himself with a copy of the letter—if he cannot do so, I dare say I can supply him—and asking me whether it is a genuine document, and he can then take any proceedings with respect to it that he thinks fit.

MR. SPEAKER: There seems to me to be a difficulty as to the form of the Motion of the hon. Member for Belfast. He has moved an Address to the Crown for Copies of certain Papers; but, in effect, his Motion is merely the expression of a desire that a certain letter written by the Prime Minister to a Member of this House should be produced. I do not think the form of an Address to the Crown for a letter that is not in the possession of any Public Department is a proper one.

After a brief consultation with Mr. W. JOHNSTON,

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Belfast desires to withdraw his Motion for an Address, and to be permitted to move simply for the production of the letter to the hon. Member for the Queen's County.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Letter from the Right honourable the First Lord of the Treasury to the honourable Member for Queen's County, dated the 30th day of November 1870, in which reference is made to 'the Sovereign Pontiff;' and it is declared that 'Her Majesty's Government consider all that relates to the adequate support of the dignity of the Pope, and to his personal freedom and independence in the discharge of his spiritual functions to be legitimate matter for their notice.'"—(Mr. William Johnston.)

MR. GLADSTONE: The First Lord of the Treasury is one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, and is also a Member of this House. In the double capacity, therefore, of First Lord of the Treasury and Member of the House I am not willing to accede to a Motion of this kind, which I believe to be wholly without precedent, and which, if carried, would result in no practical convenience. I have pointed out to the hon. Member a simple and easy method by which he can place the letter on the records of the House; and if he does not choose to avail himself of that method I have no course open but to oppose his Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. The only effect of the method suggested by the right hon. Gentleman would be to place the letter in Hansard's Debates, and not upon the records of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman could suggest a mode by which the letter would appear upon the Journals of that House, he, for one, would be willing to accede to it.

MR. CARDWELL: I should like, Sir, to ask you a question on this subject. If the letter is to be produced, I presume it must be produced by some person, and I should like to know upon whom the order to produce is to be made.

MR. SPEAKER: Upon the Gentleman to whom the letter was addressed, and in whose custody it remains.

Question put.

IRELAND—HIGH SHERIFFS OF WESTMEATH AND LOUTH.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. MONK rose to call attention to the recent nomination of High Sheriffs for the counties of Westmeath and Louth. A short time ago the appointments of High Sheriff for the counties in Ireland were made, and among those appointments were those of two or three gentlemen who had no property of any description in Ireland, and, so far as he was advised, no qualification to serve in the office of Sheriff for any county in Ireland. It had, for some time past, been the practice for the Government of Ireland to appoint gentlemen to the office of High Sheriff of a county without any reference to their possessing any land or other qualification in Ireland. A relative of his own, who did not pos-sees an acre of land in Ireland, and who had no residence in that county, and who, in fact, had never resided in Ireland, was recently nominated to the office of High Sheriff for the county of Westmeath. His relative requested to be excused from serving; but he was informed by an officer of the Irish Government that it was necessary he should take upon himself that office. Believing that it was his duty to serve his Sovereign in that capacity, he had taken the oaths as Sheriff; but before undertaking the responsibilities of High Sheriff of Westmeath, which was not altogether in a satisfactory state, and in which it was not improbable that there might be a capital conviction during his term of office, he was anxious to ascertain whether the acts he might perform as High Sheriff of Westmeath would be legal. The 14 Charles II., c. 21, contained the following section:—

“And it is hereby further provided and ordained that no person shall be assigned to be Sheriff of any county within this realm except such as have land within the said county sufficient to answer the King and his people.”

He (Mr. Monk) had the authority of a learned Queen's Counsel for saying that his hon. relative was not duly qualified to hold the office of High Sheriff, and that all his acts done in that capacity would be illegal. Since he had entered the House he was informed by his hon. Friend the Member for East Kent (Mr. Milles) that having been pricked for the office of High Sheriff of that county, as the eldest son of a Peer, though possessing no land or property of any description in the county, he had instructed his legal advisers to protest against his nomination to the office, and it was ruled by the Judges that the appointment was invalid, and it was consequently cancelled.

CAPTAIN BRINCKMAN, in seconding the Motion, said, that a relative of his had been pricked for the office of High Sheriff of Donegal, who resided in a house lent him by his father, and neither the house nor the land which surrounded it ever would be his own.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Correspondence that has taken place between the gentlemen nominated to be High Sheriffs for the counties of Westmeath and Louth and Her Majesty's Government.”—(Mr. Monk.)

Mr. Monk

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had been very impatient and somewhat unreasonable in bringing the matter before the House. He had only that evening received from Ireland the correspondence alluded to, expressing a doubt as to the legality of the appointment, and requesting that he would submit the point to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion. That he had already done, and it was quite impossible that he could obtain their opinion in two or three hours. Everything had been done that the gentlemen in question asked to be done, and he was perfectly satisfied with the course the Government proposed to adopt. He believed the practice in Ireland was very different from that in England, and that gentlemen there who had no property in the county had been called upon to serve, and had done so. At all events, the initiative was not taken by the Executive, but by the Judges. The Judges prepared a list, which they submitted to the Executive, and all the Executive did was to take the first names on the list and nominate them. Now, if the practice was illegal, it was one that had been initiated and sanctioned by the Judges of the land; but if it were found to be wrong, the practice would be discontinued, and means would be taken to relieve those who had this year been so appointed. As to the production of the correspondence, he begged to call attention to the fact that the Motion was made entirely without Notice. He would look into the correspondence, and see whether the whole or any part of it could be produced; but, on the part of the Government, he must decline to produce a correspondence which he had not had an opportunity of considering.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, as he had been so pointedly alluded to he should say a word in explanation. He thought when the question was put to him—and he still thought—that it would be an improper thing for him, in answer to a Question in this House, to review the decision of the Judges; if the Law Officers of the Crown, when the question had been considered by them, were of opinion that the gentlemen in question had been improperly appointed, the Government would take means to remedy whatever had been wrongly done, and to appoint others to the offices. He did not, however, anticipate that any such conclusion would be come to.

(Mr. Plimsoll, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Lambert.)

MR. PLIMSOLL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that during the last 25 years there had been legislation for the benefit of those who were engaged in almost every branch of industry, except that of shipping, although upwards of 738,000 persons were engaged in it; and they might as well have been the inhabitants of any other country for the care that had been taken of them. The wages of workmen on land, in case of bankruptcy, were as safe as a landlord's rent; but it was not so with reference to workmen on the seas. A ship had recently come home, after an 18 months' voyage, and the owner having become bankrupt the mortgagee had taken the ship and her earnings, leaving the crew without their wages or redress, although a sum of £50 was coming to each of the men. The law which punished workmen for leaving their employment without leave by imprisonment had been repealed; but only last week the magistrates of North Shields committed three men to gaol for 14 days, because they refused to go to sea in the David Malcolm, which the log-book showed was making from four to five inches of water per hour; and those men were in gaol now. In order to ensure the safety of a dwelling-house, the Building Act required that the plans should first be approved by the district surveyor; but, in the case of a ship, the builders might use inferior material in its construction, and thereby imperil the lives of the crew, without interference on the part of the authorities. We limited the load of an omnibus simply to consult the convenience of the passengers, but we refused to limit the load of a ship, although, in the latter instance, lives were immediately in jeopardy. Formerly an owner anxiously awaited the arrival of his vessel, especially if her voyage was longer than usual; but since the existence of marine insurance his anxiety was greatly diminished, and he frequently reaped a pecuniary advantage from the loss of the ship. He held in his hand a minified copy of the wreck chart, which showed that, during the past year, 2,589 vessels had been lost; and in their Report for the preceding year the Board of Trade stated that the number of vessels employed in the regular carrying trade that had suffered wreck or casualty was 2,000, and that half of this number represented unseaworthy and overladen vessels, of the collier class. The National Life Boat Institution, in their quarterly journal for November, 1870, again called attention to the rotten state of many of the ships, about 20 years old, that were wrecked every year, and remarked that, in too many instances, when such vessels got ashore, the crews perished before the life boat could possibly reach them. On our own coasts alone some 3,053 lives had been lost in the course of the three years ending December, 1868, being an annual average of about

1,018. But in accurately measuring the extent of the loss of life, the number of persons saved by life boats and other voluntary agencies must be included. In one year alone, 5,121 men had been saved, so that the loss of life should be reckoned at 6,000 to 7,000 but for those agencies. Such was the condition of some of the vessels employed on the East Coast that the ordinary societies refused to insure them; and, under those circumstances, the owners formed themselves into a mutual insurance club, in order to insure each other against the loss of their vessels. While conversing with a shipowner in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, he ascertained that one club of this class called the "Ocean" stopped payment, after having been called upon to contribute 20 per cent premium for one year and 24 in the next, showing that the vessels in these clubs had only about four years of life left in them at the time they were insured. He also learned that the shareholders in the Shields Marine Club had to pay no less than 30 per cent for the losses of a single year. All these existing evils he asked the House to remedy. Several of the causes of disaster among shipping were so patent that they might at once be considered with a view to immediate legislation, while some of the causes would doubtless require special knowledge, such as qualified men might give. A great number of vessels were lost every year simply from rot; they were so utterly bad that the sails might be taken, doubled in the hands, and rent; he had seen a mast of 16 inches in diameter which, when sawn asunder, was found to contain only four inches of sound wood, and the rest was so soft that a dinner knife could be driven into it up to the handle. He could take hon. Members to the Pool below London Bridge and point out a dozen ships into whose masts the ferule of an umbrella could be driven up to the umbrella itself; and where they had great difficulty in preventing the men from shovelling up the bilge planks when they shovelled up the coal. Surely, with such facts as these in its possession, the House was competent to decide whether such vessels should be allowed to go to sea in a laden state without being repaired? The House could have no hesitation in at once pronouncing upon that issue. Another cause of disaster was overloading, and he was prepared to say that several vessels were overladen with the positive design that they should sink in the course of their voyages. ["Oh, oh!"] It was quite true, and he could substantiate the statement. Where this design did not exist the overloading was carried on to such an extent as to render the vessel practically unseaworthy. The House would, therefore, experience no difficulty in arriving at a decision on that issue also. With regard to excessive insurance, he mentioned several cases in which vessels, having previously been insured for sums beyond their actual value, were lost, and brought pecuniary advantage to the owners. In one case, which came before the Lord Mayor last year, the owner of a ship confessed he had only given £300 for a ship, whereas he had actually insured it for £1,000. Was it not an insult to common sense to suppose that the owner of that ship wished it to make its voyage in safety? In North Shields, too, only a fortnight ago, an owner confessed in a Court of Law that he had insured for £800 a vessel which he expected would not sell for £400; and this confession was made on the charge that he had intended the vessel's destruction. In another case, an owner having paid £7,500 for a vessel, £5,000 of the purchase money being left on mortgage, sent in a proposal to Lloyd's to insure it for five-sixths of what he declared its value to be—namely, £13,000. In the last case the rate of premium was eight guineas per cent per annum, and the underwriters were induced, by false representations, to accept the payment of 400 guineas per annum more than they would have taken had they known the facts of the case. People who were in business expected to make a profit from their outlay, but how could a profit be gained in this instance, except by the actual foundering of the ship, which took place within the year, involving the loss of 23 lives? The two principles on which this measure rested were, to render a survey of unclassed ships compulsory, and to prohibit the overloading of ships that were to be sent to sea. Both these principles were indicated in a memorial to the Board of Trade adopted by the Association of Chambers of Commerce at a meeting held in the Westminster Palace Hotel last year. Considering the number of lives jeopardized, it was deeply to be regretted that vessels, unlike houses, should be allowed not only to be badly constructed, but to be lengthened or altered in any other way, without proper regard being had to the relative strength of the unaltered portions of the vessel. In support of his proposal to inspect ships he mentioned the case of a vessel seven breadths in length being cut in half, and 40 feet being put in the middle, thus increasing its length from seven breadths to nine and a half breadths; and this was done without the proper addition of bulkheads, knees, and other strengthening work. Another source of disaster was bad stowage, which might be easily ascertained. Many ships were sent to sea very inadequately manned. He had a letter in his hand telling him that a screw steamer 1,500 tons register left Liverpool on a voyage to the East with only eight deck hands on board. That would be all very well in fine weather; but it would be fatal if the weather were rough. Another such source was deficient engine power, which also was most disastrous in bad weather. These were subjects which might be submitted to Committees in the progress of the Session; but he now directed attention to matters with a view to preventing the overloading of ships and the sending of unworthy ships to sea. The Chambers of Commerce in nearly all the great towns had adopted similar resolutions, and all of them asked the Government to do that which he now asked the Government and the House to do. But the most signal confirmation of the justice and the propriety of the proposals which he submitted to the House was contained in a communication to The Shipping Gazette, from Mr. W. C. Rundell, a man of considerable experience and knowledge in the port of Liverpool. He said—

"Mr. Plimsoll's proposal has met with a large amount of the support of the shipowners of this town. The committee of the Shipowners' Association have unanimously supported this—the enforcement of a load-line—part of the Bill, as they consider that while this restriction on the loading of shipping will not affect those who load their vessels properly, it will act as a check on others who do not, and will considerably reduce the amount of insurance."

Mr. Rundell was the secretary of the Liverpool body of underwriters, and the Liverpool shipowners had supported the passing of the Bill. Besides this, there was almost unanimity in the Press. During the last month he (Mr. Plimsoll) addressed an assemblage in the Free Trade Hall in Manchester, and he had since received no less than 31 newspapers, containing leading articles on the subject. These came from Manchester, Sheffield, Leeds, Derby, Liverpool, Newcastle, Devonport, Bristol, and several other places; but of the whole 31 only two deprecated a change in the matter, and all the rest expressed themselves in unqualified terms of approval of the proposals of the Bill—that ships requiring repairs should be repaired, and that ships should not be overloaded. Some people thought it was not the duty of the Government to see to these matters, but that it was the duty of the insurers or underwriters; but there could not be a greater mistake than that. There were at least four cardinal differences or points of contrast between insuring a house and insuring a ship. He would give as an illustration the case of an insurance effected at Lloyd's in January, 1868, for £10,000 upon goods to be shipped in India for England. The goods in question were put into eight ships, and the number of people who underwrote that policy—that was, who accepted a portion of the risk—were 34 who engaged for £200 each, 16 for £150 each, and eight for £100 each; and, as eight ships were employed, in dividing the risk among these different persons it followed that no individual underwriter was interested to a larger amount than £25 in any single ship. How, then, could they expect people who were so little interested to take the trouble of inquiring into the seaworthiness of the vessels, or, in case of a disaster, to dispute by costly litigation their liability to the claim made upon them? Another policy was for a £50,000 cargo from Bombay to any port of the United Kingdom. In that case 53 persons underwrote for £500, 25 for £400, 11 for £300, 4 for £250, and 11 for £200 each; but as five ships had been employed to bring home the freight, the highest claim of any one underwriter was too small a sum to give him an interest of £100. From a full knowledge of the whole matter, extending over a long time, he was sure that it would be more reasonable to ask the first gentleman they met in the streets to institute an inquiry into a case of the presumed unseaworthiness of a ship than to ask an underwriter, because any banker or trader could do it without raising a suspicion as to his motives or damaging his business prospects; whereas the underwriter who did so would expose his conduct to misconstruction, and forfeit all his chances of doing business in future. The divergences in different load-lines were made very much of by those who opposed his views, and the difficulties attending his proposal were said to be so great that it could not be carried out. He granted the difficulty, but denied that it was insuperable, and asked what good work had ever been done that was not difficult. What he wanted to do was not to hamper the honest shipowner who wished to load his ships so that they might make their voyages in safety, but to meet the case of those—not so few in number, he was sorry to say, as some hon. Gentlemen supposed—who loaded a ship with the definite purpose that the load should sink the ship. The real practical difficulty was not in fixing upon a proper load-line so much as that those men were resolutely bent on shirking any such line at all, with the view of loading their ships just as they pleased. In insuring a house the policyholder was comparatively weak and the insurance office strong; whereas in the case of ships the party insuring was frequently much stronger than the underwriter. The man insuring a house must do something which involved imminent risk of detection or exposed the lives of his own family before he could cheat the insurance office; but the man who insured an unseaworthy ship need do nothing. Doing nothing was the essence of the offence. He had nothing to do but to neglect the ship, and she would inevitably sink to the bottom. Again, if a house was burnt down and there was suspicion of fraud, the witnesses were generally on the spot, and could easily be examined; whereas, when a ship was lost the witnesses might all be at the bottom of the sea, or, if saved, be at the other end of the world. There was no analogy, therefore, between the two cases, and it would be more reasonable to expect a stranger to investigate a particular case of shipwreck than an individual underwriter. The remedy he proposed was a compulsory survey of unclassed ships. He insisted on the imperative necessity of having ships that had run out all their various grades of classification properly surveyed before they were allowed to go to sea with valuable lives on board, and also of putting some restraint on the homicidal cupidity of those who overloaded ships. All shipowners were not guilty of those practices; the great majority, indeed, loaded their ships with due regard to safety, and did their best to keep them afloat. The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Elliot) had a large number of ships between the Tyne and Thames since 1859, and these vessels had been running rapidly backwards and forwards ever since. In the case of those vessels, though the voyage was a dangerous one, and they were at sea three-fourths of the year, there had been no casualties and no lives lost in the whole period of 12 years, because they were never over loaded, were well repaired, and properly looked after. If the same treatment were applied to other vessels they would have similar good results. Indeed, with seaworthy ships and no overloading, they might travel by water with as perfect safety and even greater than by railway. He could give the House another fact, which was still more encouraging. In 1860 the firm of Anthony Gibbs and Co. entered into a contract with the Peruvian Government for guano. At first the casualties among their ships were frequent, owing to the absence of any proper system of survey; but at length Mr. Stubbs, the head of the firm at Lima, made an arrangement with the Custom House officers of that port not to issue clearance papers to the captain of any ship, unless he produced a certificate from their surveyor to the effect that the ship was not overloaded. Now, what was the result? Before the introduction of that rule the casualties averaged two per week, though the number of vessels loaded per annum was less than 400; but after the rule had come into force, during the four years that came under the observation of his informant, living at Callao, not a single one of the ships foundered, and the average even of trifling casualties was only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The arguments in favour of the Bill being so irresistible, what were the objections to it? He would quote those that were advanced last year by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) whose duty it then was to reply to him on the part of the Government. The first objection was, that to interfere in the way he proposed would destroy the responsibility of the owners of vessels. He would reply that at the present moment no such responsibility existed. Except in the case of the Sea Queen, it would be found that official inquiry had never followed the loss of any merchant vessel. The second objection was, that by rendering compulsory the survey of unclassified ships only, they would recognize private institutions—as Lloyd's. Certainly it would be equivalent to the recognition of private enterprise, and it seemed to him that the State ought to be glad to recognize it wherever it was of so beneficial a character, and ought to rejoice to know that half the task of providing for the safety of our sailors was already accomplished. The third objection was, that it would require an army of surveyors. Now, 27,000 vessels were registered in English ports, of which 13,000 were in Lloyd's book, and were annually surveyed, the work being done by 39 surveyors, who gave the whole of their time to it, assisted by 16 who were partially employed. If they were to make the necessary deductions for passenger vessels, the mail boats, the Inman, Cunard, and Peninsular and Oriental boats, and the ships built during the last five years, all of which would not require to be surveyed, he found that the whole number of surveyors that would be necessary to carry out the Bill was 17, and he had been told by good authorities that even that estimate was too high. The next objection was, that it would cost an immense sum annually—about £500,000. Lloyd's Committee for registering ships was started without capital, adopting a scale of fees which should make their operations self-supporting; and both owners and builders of ships were glad to have their ships surveyed and classed at Lloyd's. The business of the registering committee succeeded so well and the fees came in so fast that the salaries were raised all round; and still in one year the society had a large surplus that was now in the bank, being literally at a loss what to do with the money, because they had no proprietary and no subscribed capital. He did not ask the Government to do gratuitously for the imprudent shipowner what the prudent one paid to have done for him; and his system, he believed, could be made not only to pay for itself, but to yield a large balance to be handed over to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The last objection was, that the Bill would be an undue interference with the rights of individuals.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the hon. Gentleman was mistaken. He never denied the right of Parliament to interfere, as it did in the case of mines; he only questioned the expediency of interference.

MR. PLIMSOLL: Well, at any rate the objection had been adduced, and therefore he desired to point out that, since the State claimed the right to supervise the erection of houses, the arrangements in manufactories, the ventilation and safety of mines, and a thousand other departments of private enterprise, there could be no valid reason why it should leave the lives of our sailors to the mercy of mercenary and reckless shipowners. There could be neither reason nor justice in allowing a man at Hull or Newcastle to buy a ship so rotten that out of a diameter of 16 inches only four were sound wood—so rotten that the sails split at the first breath of a gale; so rotten that you could drive a table knife up to the handle in its hull, or the end of your umbrella in the planks. There was neither reason nor justice in permitting to buy a worn-out ship at the rate of 4s. a ton—whereas the price of a new ship was from £10 to £14 a ton—and then allowing to tar it over and to send it to sea in spite of the earnest remonstrances of its former owner, until it foundered with the lives of all the men who had been cajoled on board. But more than that, a vessel might be a stout one, but after the crew had signed the articles the owner might so overload it as to leave a freeboard of only 20 inches instead of five feet. Was it just that the crew should, nevertheless, be compelled by law to put to sea in her, or, if they refused, be liable to imprisonment by a magistrate? Yet, when Parliament was asked to devote a little of its time to delivering from death so useful and deserving a class of our population, they were told by a Member of the Government that they must not presume to check the homicidal cupidity of such shipowners, because it would be an undue interference with private rights. He maintained that it was not an undue interference, on the contrary, that it was long overdue; and it was a shame, and a disgrace and reproach to the Liberal party that, after 40 years of predominance and power, this thing yet remained to be done. Out-of-doors one might find everybody wishing him God speed in his present efforts; but when he came into quarters nearer home there were people who sought to stifle inquiry and to avoid change. He could not, however, make his appeal to the Liberal party exclusively; indeed, he had been told by a working man at Manchester that all the measures that had been passed for the social improvement of the people were owing to the Conservatives. He would ask the good and just men on both sides of the House alike to give their support to this Bill. If they rejected it, or even postponed it for a year, they knew, on the authority of the Board of Trade, that some 500 or 600 lives would be lost. On the other hand, if they now adopted his proposal, the storms of winter might return, but our brave sailors, in sound and seaworthy ships, would be able to battle successfully with the tempest that would otherwise have overwhelmed them in death; and, when they made the desired port in safety, they would accord to that House the blessing of those who had been ready to perish. The duty of visiting the widow and the fatherless was enjoined by Divine authority; but he hoped the House would perform the higher, the nobler, and still more sacred duty of saving the wives and children of our English sailors from the sad fate that now often befell them.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in seconding the Motion, said, he did so on perhaps even broader grounds than those urged by the hon. Member for Derby who brought it forward. He maintained the necessity of saving human life whenever and wherever it was in danger. If mines, buildings, and even cabs required competent supervision, it was ten times as necessary in a case like the present. The fact that some vessels which had been condemned had made their voyages in safety proved nothing against the general argument. If, as practical men, they took the wreck chart and went over the whole North and North-East Coast of England, they could have no doubt whatever that it was high time something was done to save the lives of those who navigated those waters. He knew the dangers of that coast, and that it was because ships were unclassified and their seaworthiness not looked into that so many of those afflicting casualties occurred. That was not a question of ship-owners or shipmasters, since persons in such positions might do pretty well as they pleased about such ships; but of the safety of the working sailor, who was now obliged, under pain of imprisonment, to go to sea in a vessel which he perhaps, subsequently to his having signed articles, discovered to be totally unseaworthy. That was the state of the law and of the fact; and he contended that there ought to be some person in authority whose duty it was to survey ships and see that they were in proper condition before they went to sea. He most cordially supported the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Plimsoll.)

MR. EUSTACE SMITH, in moving that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, said, his object was not to deny that something ought to be done, or that ships sometimes went to sea in an improper condition or overloaded; but to show that the means proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Plimsoll) were totally unsuited to the purpose he had in view. That was not a question of police regulation or of sanitary law. The point which he wished to bring before the House was this—that any man who, either through negligence or an sea undue desire for gain, sent a ship to in an unseaworthy condition, or anyone who loaded to such an extent as to render a ship unseaworthy when loaded, was committing a crime before God and man. That was a matter that ought to be dealt with by the criminal law of the country. It was a reproach to that law if it was unable promptly and effectually to punish such an offence, and the sooner it was altered the better. He objected, however, to handing over the inspection of these matters to a number of irresponsible surveyors, and leaving them to give the shipowner a bill of indemnity under which he might commit an offence against the law. If this Bill should pass into law, the logical thing for the hon. Member to do next Session would be to bring in a Bill for the protection of life on shore, the Preamble of which should state that, whereas it was expedient to provide for the greater security of the lives of men employed on shore, and whereas many crimes were committed, be it enacted that no man shall leave his house after dark unless he can get a certificate of good character from the Zoological Society in Regent's Park, the Horticultural Society in South Kensington, or the policeman round the corner; but that if he obtained a certificate from two societies having no legal status in this country, he might do as he liked. That Bill would violate the first principles of English law by putting the innocent in the same position as the guilty, for the hon. Member admitted that it was only a small minority who sent their ships to sea in the condition complained of. Much indignation had been expressed lately among the constituencies against particular Acts which placed a certain class of the community under the surveillance of the police, before there was any evidence that they intended to commit an offence against the law. It would be a still greater outrage than that to place under the surveillance of the police, without any evidence on which to go, a class who, whatever the faults of individual members of it, had raised the Mercantile Marine of this country to the greatest position of any Mercantile Marine ever known. He considered the Bill as singularly inopportune at the present time. Two things were necessary to justify the kind of legislation now proposed. One of them was that the offence was increasing, and the other that there were no means of dealing with it. On this point he might refer to Lloyd's returns for the last 10 years. During the last five years, with the exception of one year, the number of wrecks and casualties had been below the average, and in the five preceding years there was only one exception in which it had been above the average. The number of lives lost in the last year was 20 per cent less than the average, and in the first half-year of 1870 the number was below the average. It had been stated that many lives were lost from ships breaking up when driven ashore in consequence of the badness of those ships. Now, the fact was that the number of lives lost had decreased, while the number saved had increased, leading to the conclusion that the ships that had recently been driven on shore were in a better condition than the ships which were driven ashore formerly. Another reason for believing this to be an inopportune time for dealing with the question was that the Government had introduced a measure which proposed to deal with it in a proper way, for it proposed to deal with the crime under the criminal law. Any ship reputed to be unseaworthy would be liable to inspection and detention. Then the draught of water was to be taken, thus affording means of further investigation. He trusted that one result of this discussion would be that Her Majesty's Government would show increased zeal in carrying their Bill through the House; that further delay in legislating upon the question would be prevented, and thus that the shipping interest would be saved from being made the victim of crude amateur legislation. Not only did he object to the principle of the present Bill, but to the machinery proposed to carry it into effect, which was singularly inefficient. With respect to Lloyd's Register, it was conducted by a committee in no way responsible to the public. Nothing was known of the constitution of that committee, or the grounds on which its decisions were based, and there was no appeal from those decisions. He thought it most undesirable to hand over the shipping for inspection to a body over whom the public had no control. With regard to the Liverpool Association, which was a rival association, still less was known. And now the House was asked to give a legislative sanction to those two irresponsible bodies, when the Tyne, the Clyde, and the Wear were outvying Liverpool in the building of ships. Then, with respect to placing the matter in the hands of Government Inspectors. No doubt the business of the Admiralty generally was well conducted; but there was a recent instance in which they had been unable to calculate within two feet the draught of a ship that was sent to sea. In addition to the Bill being inefficient he believed that its results would be most injurious. The hon. Member, in drawing his Bill, had evidently met with one difficulty, and that was the mode of dealing with foreign as well as with British ships. There would be a great difficulty in placing them in the same category. If any difference was made in favour of foreign shipping, as compared with British shipping, the result would be that British shipowners would sail their ships under a foreign flag, in order to enjoy the advantages offered to foreigners and to evade the regulations made for British ships; whereas if both British and foreign ships had to submit to these regulations, involving, perhaps, considerable expense to the shipowner, we must expect that foreign Governments would imitate our example, and our shipowners would have to submit to exactions of all kinds in foreign ports, which would be levied under regulations nominally for the improvement of shipping, but really instituted in order to put money into the pockets of some official. Then, with respect to iron ships. Until very recently there had been no classing of these ships. The rules at Lloyd's had not been in existence more than 12 months, and if Inspectors should be appointed they would merely act upon their instructions, and not show any desire to improve them. The fact was that almost every improvement that had taken place within the last 20 years had been violated. On looking at the Bill of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) anyone would imagine that there were no ships unclassified. Now, the fact was that many of our large steam ships were not classed either at Lloyd's or anywhere else. One of the largest lines of Australian vessels had not a single ship classed. He knew of one ship which went to India for 12 years without being classed. When Lloyd's rules were altered that vessel was classed, and she was sold to the Government of India, after being in service some 20 years. He did not think that such a Bill as this could ever pass into law. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the case of the David Malcolm; but he understood there was a sufficient answer to the whole matter in the hands of the Board of Trade, and if the hon. Gentleman had persevered in his Question the other night on that subject, instead of withdrawing it then and making an ex parte statement now, he might have been better informed upon the circumstances of the case. Then the proposed regulations respecting coal were absurd, because it was well known that a ship of 1,000 tons was safer with 1,250 tons of coal on board than she would be if she carried 1,000 tons of iron. He did not believe the Bill would receive the sanction of the Legislature, inasmuch as it was inadequate to prevent evils which it proposed to check, unjust in its operation, inopportune in point of time, utterly inefficient in its machinery, and generally injurious to the shipping interest of the country. Under these circumstances, he begged to move that the second reading of the Bill be postponed until that day six months.

MR. RATHBONE, in seconding the Amendment, said, he was sure there was no Member of the House who would not greatly sympathize with those who had brought in this Bill, in their wish to prevent ships from being sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition. No body of men were so much interested in this question as the shipowners of our large seaport towns, like the one he had the honour to represent. On looking at the back of the Bill it would be found to bear the names of three hon. Members representing inland constituencies, which fully accounted for the ignorance it displayed of the practical working of maritime affairs. His objection to the present Bill, and the objection which he believed was entertained by all the representatives of large maritime constituencies, was that it would tend to increase the very dangers which it was intended to prevent. The Bill was called the Merchant Shipping Survey Bill; but its title ought really to have been—"An Act to oblige the Board of Trade to grant certificates which would enable dishonest and incompetent shipowners to carry on their trade without fear of consequences." Its provisions, if it were passed, would be complied with conscientiously by the fair-dealing and honest shipowners, for whose guidance, indeed, they were quite unnecessary, while they would only impede the good management of ships; but, at the same time, they could be most easily evaded by anyone who was dishonest enough to make it his interest to send unseaworthy ships to sea. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had ridiculed the idea of their being any difficulty in finding any number of competent surveyors to carry out the details of the Bill, and got over the difficulty in a very easy way by saying that there were many ships which would not require to be surveyed. The hon. Gentleman then alluded to all the large steamboat companies and their vessels; but he had forgotten—or, perhaps, he was not aware of the fact—that these steamboats were unclassed ships, and that therefore the Bill would apply to them as well as to the old rotten tubs which the hon. Gentleman has described. Was the hon. Gentleman aware of the immense temptation which the dishonest man or the man owning bad ships would be able to offer to the surveyors for the sake of getting them to grant him a certificate which would enable him to carry on his trade with impunity? Did the hon. Gentleman know that in a steam vessel of 2,170 tons every foot of immersion represented 225 tons of cargo carried, and taking only £6 a ton for a round voyage to India and back, it would be seen that in a single voyage the dishonest shipowner who could get his load-line placed one foot above what it ought to be would be able to make a profit of £1,200 or £1,300 more than he would otherwise obtain, so that he would be able to pay very handsomely to any surveyor who would accommodate him with a dishonest certificate. Then in the 3rd section of the Bill it was provided that the surveyor was to take into account the nature of the cargo and of the voyage to be made by the ship, and, of course, the survey was to be made before the contract for the voyage was entered into. But anybody who had any practical experience in shipping matters was aware that the shipowner very often did not know an hour before he made his contract and settled his party to what part he was going to send his ship, or what would be the nature of her cargo. He very often did not know the nature of all the cargo until after the contract was made, and if all the trouble of making the survey was to be taken then, and the whole trade of the country was compelled to submit to such an arrangement, the difficulties of carrying on that trade would be simply enormous, and good shipowners would be tempted to place their ships under foreign flags to escape such a burden. Any shipowner knew that he himself, until he had experienced the working of his own ship, could not decide to what depth he could safely load, nor what kind of cargo he could safely put on board, and the effect of this Bill would be simply this—that the surveyor would have to take the advice of the shipowner himself on this point, and that survey would therefore amount to absolutely nothing. No doubt that clause was inserted in the Bill to meet the objection entertained last year as to the question of the load line. On that point of the load-line the hon. Gentleman had quoted the Liverpool underwriters as entirely agreeing with him; but he (Mr. Rathbone) would first read a paragraph from their report of 1870, to show what importance they attached to it. The report stated that—

"A Motion was made by Sir John Pakington for a Commission of Inquiry on the subject, and 'A Bill to provide for the Greater Security of Life at Sea,' was brought in by Mr. Plimsoll and Mr. Wheelhouse; but the only result was a vague discussion of the subject. It is probable that the matter will again be brought before the House of Commons in the next Session. The difficulty of defining the proper load-line for a ship, especially when regard is had to differences of class, of cargo, of season and of length of voyage, is already observed to be much greater than was at first anticipated. It is now admitted that no simple rule can be made applicable with justice to all vessels."

If the load-line were not effectual for the purpose for which it was intended, it would be simply dangerous, and it was evident that what might be quite safe and proper for a vessel three years old might be very dangerous for a vessel four years old, still more dangerous for one five years old, and so on in an increasing proportion. Any of the restrictions given under this Bill which were not efficient, would have the effect of lulling the vigilance of all concerned, and of removing responsibility from those who alone could take the necessary precautions for the safety of lives and vessels, and in that way every inefficient restriction would reduce the very safety which was sought to be gained. There was another clause in the Bill, in which the hon. Gentleman provided that a shipowner should not be allowed to repair a ship if it was imprudent for him to do so. He (Mr. Rathbone) only wished the hon. Gentleman could give them a rule by which they would be able to decide that point. To repair a vessel was a mere question of cost of putting in a sufficient amount of planks, beams, knees, &c.; but many shipowners had often found to their cost that when they had once begun repairing they had had almost to rebuild a ship. In his opinion, the measure now under discussion was not calculated to effect its object, and was likely to increase the evils it was intended to prevent. The legislation required was such as would increase the responsibility of the shipowners, and not relieve them from it altogether, as this measure was calculated to do. If the Bill were carried, the public and the underwriters would be lulled into a false security, and would rely upon anything rather than their vigilance to guard against danger. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman, on the other hand, made it a misdemeanour for a shipowner to send to sea an unworthy ship, relieved sailors from the obligation to sail in such a vessel that now existed, and required that a proper record should be kept of each ship's draught of water, so that the necessary evidence might always be at hand for bringing the law home to the guilty. For the reasons he had given he begged to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Eustace Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Mr. HENLEY said, the Bill required very careful consideration to see how far it justified the grounds on which it had been brought forward. In the first place, was it brought forward at an opportune time? Hardly; for they had already before them a Bill of the Government on shipping matters containing 600 or 700 sections, and treating of everything, and yet the present Bill was introduced, like Smellfungus, to do something else besides. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) ought to have waited to see if he could not get those provisions which he thought essential incorporated with the Government measure. A leading feature in this Bill was its great extent—it dealt with every boat on every tidal river in the United Kingdom, for the Courts of Law had recently decided that the word "ship" included every boat propelled by anything other than oars alone, so that every boat which had the means of shipping a mast and sail would come under the provisions of this measure. Then the proposed survey was to be made annually, for ships were only to be certified for 12 months, and the expense that would thus be involved would be a very considerable tax upon the shipowners every year. The certificate, however, was only to deal with the hull and rigging, and would have nothing to do with sails, anchors, or cables, which were of equal importance with the other parts of the vessel; and it seemed to him but a queer kind of provision for the saving of life which would allow a ship to go to sea without any sails, anchors, or cables. As to the load-line, the Bill was not confined to unclassified vessels, but extended to all, and the load-line might be fixed upon a principle which applied very well to one kind of vessel, but which would not apply at all, or apply very badly to another kind, and as many people might be sent to "Davy Jones's locker" through that as were sent there at present. The next point in the Bill was a very curious one, seeing that the measure was brought forward on the plea that it would tend to the saving of life. Whenever Manchester was a little dull, the case of the Liverpool shipowners was immediately brought forward, and every Manchester man vehemently cheered everything said about Liverpool. But the people in the country said this—not that he should think of making such a statement himself—that this was nothing more than a "humanity dodge" to set up a monopoly for inland coal at the expense of seaborne coal. It was singular that the Bill should give some colour to that insinuation by placing restrictions upon ships bringing coal to the Thames which were not to be enforced in the case of their taking that commodity to Hamburg or Havre. With respect to the alleged overloading of vessels, it had been shown by the Returns for 1869 that, of 143 vessels which had foundered or stranded off the coast, the very large proportion of 55 were in ballast. That was a fact that went far to shake the general opinion that the loss of life at sea was occasioned by overloading vessels. He himself thought that Government interference very often did more harm than good. No one could look back for the last 30 years without connecting the constant increase in the number of wrecks with the continual interference of Government in maritime affairs; but still, whatever ought to be done in legislating on this subject had better be done in the Bill introduced by the Government; and, perhaps, it would be better still to leave the responsibility where it was at present, and not have any interference at all. No doubt it was a great hardship to compel any man who honestly believed that a vessel was unseaworthy to go to sea in that vessel; but, on the other hand, care ought to be taken not to open the door too widely to allowing men to refuse to make voyages on the mere pretence of such an allegation, which it would take so much trouble and inconvenience to prove or disprove.

MR. NORWOOD complained of the unreasonably strong and extravagant language of the hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Mr. Plimsoll), not only in that House, but out-of-doors. At a meeting in Manchester on the 11th January, for instance, the hon. Gentleman spoke of—

"Some black-hearted villains who bought and owned ships and insured them not for three-fourths of their value, which was generally considered the proper thing, but for twice and even three times their value" and who then "set their wicked arts to work to accomplish the wreck of their ships in order to get the insurance money."

The hon. Gentleman went on at the same meeting to say that that kind of thing happened every day. His statements of fact were equally extravagant. The statistics showed that the loss of life around the coasts of the United Kingdom caused by ships foundering at sea—and this applied essentially to the question of overloading—amounted, in 1870, to 435 lives in 81 vessels lost; but 53 of them were fishing boats and small craft, ranging from 11 to 80 tons, employed in specially hazardous trades, while, about one-third were in ballast, and not carrying cargo, when the accidents occurred. So, with regard to collisions, strandings, and other casualties round the coasts of the United Kingdom, fully one-third of the ships were of small tonnage and were not carrying cargo, but ballast, when accidents happened to them. The danger might, perhaps, be lessened if an uniform load-line could be fixed; but this was impossible with the many varieties of craft, both in build and rig, now used in the Mercantile Marine, and the Bill made no reference to the necessity of a minimum as well as a maximum load-line. His main objection to the Bill of the hon. Gentleman was that it would, by placing shipowners under an increased amount of surveillance, diminish their personal responsibility, and so render human life less safe at sea than it was at present. There was too much of that kind of Government interference in the Merchant Shipping Acts. The fact was that the Bill was promoted in the interests of the Register Books of Lloyd's and the Underwriters' Association of Liverpool, and those two bodies were totally irresponsible. If Parliament intended that there should be a general survey of ships, such survey must be made by a Government Department without any distinctions whatever; but if such a system should be adopted, the Board of Trade would be called upon to survey 21,000 ships of a considerable size, to say nothing of small smacks and boats. He considered the Bill to be entirely impracticable, and he indignantly repudiated the wholesale charges which had been made against shipowners. There was now in the possession of hon. Members the Merchant Shipping Code, which had been recently introduced by the Government, and as that measure would, in his opinion, deal effectually with the questions involved in the proposal before the House, he hoped the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) would not press his Bill to a Division on the Motion for second reading.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he wished to call the attention of the House to some documents which he had received from Sir Arthur Kennedy, the Governor of the West Coast of Africa. That gentleman had, during the last 12 months, sent him, by almost every mail, accounts of the overloading of steamers and vessels leaving the West Coast of Africa for this country, and especially by deck-loads. The documents he would refer to dealt only with part of the question, and in passing he would express a hope that the measure which the Government had in hand would contain a provision in reference to the subject of overloading by deck-loading. The first of these documents was a declaration, signed at Sierra Leone, in January last, by the master of a vessel, who stated that during a gale which he encountered in December a great part of his deck-load was washed overboard, and, in order to save his ship, he was compelled to cast the remainder into the sea. The list of goods lost included 50 casks of beer, 16 cases of matches, 7 casks of beer, 20 boxes of pipes, 2 crates of earthenware, 2 drums of paraffin, and 1 cask of varnish. There was also a large quantity of gunpowder. The Governor appended to the declaration the remark that this vessel was of only 138 tons register, manned by a crew of nine men, the accommodation provided for whom was unfit for a dog, for if they escaped drowning they were almost sure to die of dirt and ex-posure. The other document was a report, dated January 24, 1871, in reference to the arrival of a vessel of 898 tons; amongst the cargo of which were 1,182 casks of palm oil, 2,019 boxes of kernels, and other boxes and parcels amounting to a total of 5,201, besides 1,109 pieces of ebony. Sir Arthur Kennedy stated that this was one of five monthly steamers sailing between West Africa and Liverpool, and carrying dangerous deck-loads. He thought there could be no harm in allowing the Bill now before the House to be read a second time, so that it might be considered in Committee, and then if the Government measure was found to be more effectual, the necessity for this Bill would cease. It was the duty of the Government and the Legislature to interfere for the protection of sailors, and he should therefore vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had listened with great interest to the discussion on the Bill of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), and he thought it was calculated to bring out the real state of the case, and greatly to assist the House in giving a vote upon this very interesting though not very easy question. He entirely agreed with those who recognized the humane motives which had actuated the hon. Member in bringing the measure before the House; but their business was simply to consider whether the inconveniences which this Bill would inflict would not be greater than the advantages it could attain; and whether there were not better means of attaining the end which the hon. Member had in view. In his opinion the Government had already placed before the House better means of attaining the object, so far as the object was practicable. After giving his best attention to the subject, he was not able to advise the House to allow this Bill to be read a second time; nor was he prepared, on the part of the Government, to undertake the enormous and hardly profitable labour which the Bill proposed to impose. The hon. Member described his Bill as a limited one; but his opinion was, that if it was to do any good at all, it would involve an enormous amount of Government interference with the trade of this country. Under this Bill the Board of Trade would have to be for ever surveying every vessel in the United Kingdom, and not merely English ships, but foreign ships entering our ports. An annual survey would be by no means sufficient, because vessels were continually changing their cargoes and their voyages. As to the load-line, he was told, upon authority which he could not doubt, that no general or abstract rule could be laid down on the subject, and consequently special and numerous surveys would be necessary for that purpose also. In the 5th clause provision was made for "judicial surveys," to be made upon the application of any interested party; and in a further part of the same clause it was proposed to constitute the local Courts of Admiralty in some sort local Boards of Trade, making them administrative bodies. Under this arrangement anyone who considered a ship to be unseaworthy could put the whole machinery of the Court in motion for the survey, detention, or, if necessary, breaking-up of a ship. Such stringent provisions would require the strongest case to justify their adoption. He did not desire to lay down any absolute doctrine upon the subject, or to bind the Government by any theoretic principle to interfere or not to interfere in these matters. Such questions should be decided on their merits; but he contended that, before the House adopted a costly scheme which would cause such vexatious interference with trade, they must be well satisfied that there were no other means of gaining the same object as that sought by the hon. Member. There had been a tendency to assume that it was enough to read statistics of loss of life at sea, and to submit this Bill as a remedy. But even supposing the measure to be accepted, and to be admirably and successfully administered, how many causes of loss of life and property would it meet? It was difficult to state the number of those causes. The hon. Member admitted, however, that the Bill did not deal with some of the most important—as, for instance, the construction and manning of ships, and the stowing of cargoes, which were matters of vital importance. There were also such everyday causes as collisions, carelessness and ignorance of navigators, to say nothing of the perils of the sea, which no Bill of this kind could meet. The question, therefore, naturally arose, whether it was worth while to employ "an army of officials" of high character and at great cost, in the hope of preventing a few out of a very limited class of the accidents and disasters which produced loss of life and property at sea. As he had already said, in his opinion the Bill which the Government had placed upon the Table would meet the necessities of the case far more effectually and upon a sounder principle. That Bill contained several most important provisions in relation to this very subject. First, it provided that before a ship left port her draught of water should be carefully ascertained, in order that facility might be afforded in case of subsequent casualty, for judging as to whether she was or was not overloaded. In the next place, it made the sending of a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state a misdemeanour, thus imposing a serious responsibility upon the shipowner. The Bill would also enable any sailor to refuse to proceed with a ship in an unseaworthy condition, and to demand an official investigation by the surveyor of the Board of Trade. Lastly, the Government Bill would provide that any person having, or supposing he had, knowledge of a ship being unseaworthy, might demand and procure a Board of Trade survey. The difference between this proposal and that of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) was, that whereas the hon. Member wished to impose upon the Government a compulsory and indiscriminate survey, with all the inconveniences consequent thereupon, the Government themselves thought it best to place the power of demanding the surveys in the hands of those most nearly interested in the safety of the ships. These being the main, and, as he thought, satisfactory, provisions of the Government measure, he could not advise the House to read the Bill of the hon. Member a second time; and, therefore, in case a decision was persisted in, he should be compelled to enforce by his Vote the opinion he had expressed in regard to it.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE expressed his approval of the safeguards which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue) had described as being provided by the Government Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take the advice of some of his Friends and split the Bill, giving some of these clauses in a Bill by themselves, so that they might be certain that a part of the Bill might pass this year, and that, for the sake of humanity, the public might have the advantage of such clauses. The causes of the loss of ships were principally five—unseaworthiness, age, or other causes, overloading ships, underloading ships, and want of harbours of refuge. He thought it a great pity that any element of bitterness should be imported into this subject, which was one of great importance, and one that concerned the lives of thousands of our best seamen. The House ought to consider it with as much calmness and deliberation as possible, for he was quite certain if a Commission of naval men and shipowners were appointed they would find means by which the problem might be solved. He urged that the Bill should contain a clause for providing that vessels carrying deck-load should be subject to a special survey. With regard to harbours of refuge, that question had been considered by the Commissioners on that subject; but from the niggardly policy of this country their suggestion, that harbours of refuge would be the best means of saving a great many lives, had not been carried out. The great loss of life on the Eastern Coast arose from collisions. Ships were collected to the number of 500 sail at Beachy Head, and there was great confusion among the ships, which ended in collisions. The wrecks were not to be seen at that place, because the unfortunate ships struck on different points of the coast, and it was not to these different points of the coast that the danger attached, but to the salient points where the danger occurred. The question of the fault of captains was a serious question. He had taken pains some years ago to endeavour to persuade the Government to establish a great naval college, where the captains of merchant ships should meet with officers of the Navy and together learn the elements of their profession. When he was in great hopes that that plan would be adopted, it was laid aside. It was a matter of serious importance that steps should be taken to improve the education of the masters and officers of ships. In looking over the number of ships lost in foreign countries he found that the number of wrecks in connection with which the commander had been deprived of his certificate had been very great indeed, and the proportion in which the certificate had been returned had been very small.

Sir James Elphinstone

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, there was no doubt that many ships were lost through their unseaworthiness. He thought that any man who sent a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state for the purpose of obtaining the insurance on that ship was more guilty of cold-blooded murder than most of the criminals who were sent to the gallows; and he wondered how a shipowner who made sailors run even the smallest risk of that sort could sleep quietly in his bed when a gale of wind was blowing. He did not quite agree with the low value the hon. Member (Mr. E. Smith) had attached to the classification of ships. No doubt there were many good ships which were not classed at Lloyd's, or elsewhere, especially those which belonged to persons or companies whose name alone was a guarantee. But there were many other vessels which found the disadvantage of the want of character, in the case of insurance, or charter. When this matter was brought before him in former days, when he was in Office, three principal remedies used to be suggested—the load-line, the making this practice of sending ships to sea in an unseaworthy state a misdemeanour, and the limitation of insurance. [Mr. SAMUDA: Hear!] He knew the hon. Member had a strong opinion upon this point; but he (Mr. Cave) had come to the conclusion that such limitation would be constantly evaded. The other two points were dealt with in the Government Bill. As to the general question whether the Government should lay down strict rules as to matters of detail, the official experience he had had convinced him that the attempt to do so would defeat their own purposes, because it would relieve shipowners from responsibility. When particular modes of construction were insisted on a lower level was frequently established—the minimum was apt to become the maximum. It would be unwise to prohibit deck-loads in all cases; and as to what had been said about carrying dangerous cargo, such as petroleum, on deck, it was probably the safest place for it. He thought the proper principle to act upon was to leave the fullest freedom to all parties, and then, judging by results, to punish with the severest penalties those who were guilty of the offences in question. There were so many reasons why ships were lost besides those specified in the Bill, that he did not think the Bill was sufficiently complete to answer its purpose. He thought that more than half of the disasters to ships were attributable to carelessness, drunkenness, and want of discipline. He would say one word on the somewhat sensational cards, circulated by the promoter of the Bill, about working men on board ship. Of course, a sailor was a working man, though he would probably prefer being called a sailor; but the object of those cards seemed to be to convey an impression that sailors were neglected by the Legislature. Nothing could be farther from the fact. Acts had very recently been passed in Parliament for the amelioration of their provisions, accommodation, medicine, lime juice, and many similar objects. He thought it would be for the convenience of the House if the hon. Member withdrew his Bill, and moved Amendments or additions to the Bill of the Government on those points which he considered defective.

MR. T. HUGHES reminded the House that every speaker had admitted the need of legislation. But they were told by the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Merchant Shipping Bill to rely upon the clauses on this subject contained in that Bill. Now the Bill was one of 700 clauses, and he asked if there was any Gentleman in the House except the right hon. Gentleman himself who expected that the Bill would pass into law this year? [MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Yes.] Well, at any rate, he wished to have two strings to his bow in this matter. He (Mr. T. Hughes) pointed out that in the case of a misdemeanour for sending a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state the matter was to be enforced in one of the Superior Courts, which he declared to be a farce. He read extracts from a recent report of the Associated Chamber of Commerce to show that provision should be made for a maximum load-line to steamers, and he also read resolutions of the said Chamber to show that the Chamber approved of both principles of the Bill. Similar arguments had been used in this case by shipowners as had been used against the Factories Act and other measures, which were aimed against similar abuses in other trades. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Plimsoll) would withdraw his Bill, if the President of the Board of Trade would undertake to introduce as a separate Bill those clauses of the Merchant Shipping Bill which related to this subject. But if the right hon. Gentleman would not undertake to do so, he (Mr. T. Hughes) would vote for the second reading of his hon. Friend's Bill.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had brought the subject before the House last year, and he felt bound to express his deep regret at the shameful manner in which life and property had been sacrificed by the overloading of ships. If the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) divided, he (Sir John Pakington) should go with him into the Lobby; not because he supported every part of the Bill, but because he thought an effective remedy needed to be applied. He regretted to say that he listened without any satisfaction to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Fortescue), who addressed the House in a Board of Trade tone. The House was under great disadvantage through the frequent changes at the Board of Trade. As now constituted, that Board had no experience on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman, after the manner of the Board of Trade, was too much in favour of his big Bill, which evinced great anxiety about the trading interest, but scarcely contained a word about the wrecks that occurred around these coasts from year to year. Thousands of our fellow-citizens were annually lost through the cupidity of shipowners and through a want of proper care and vigour on the part of the Executive of this country. In his opinion there were only two ways in which this matter could be satisfactorily dealt with—one, by the Government undertaking to deal with the subject as a Government, and the other by doing that which he suggested last Session—namely, addressing the Crown for a Royal Commission of Inquiry on this subject. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accede to the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last and of his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), by introducing as a separate Bill those clauses of the Merchant Shipping Bill which related to this subject. He thought all parties would give to such a measure the fairest possible consideration. If the right hon. Gentleman would not do so, he (Sir John Pakington) gave Notice that he would repeat his proposal for a Royal Commission of Inquiry.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he was quite ready to bring in as a separate Bill such of the clauses of the Merchant Shipping Bill as had been referred to, if the latter measure should not receive the sanction of the House.

MR. GRAVES said, he thought that the measure which had been submitted to the House had met with the condemnation of hon. Members. A great many arguments had been put forward in favour of legislation, but not in favour of the measure now proposed, which he believed to be one of the most unworkable and impracticable propositions that had been brought before that House since he entered it. The proportion of losses to tonnage was 4 per cent in England, 4 per cent in Germany, 3 per cent in Sweden. In these countries there were no surveys; but in France, where the survey system existed, the proportion was 5 per cent of losses, and the Chambers of Commerce had memorialized the Government to do away with the system. The question of the proper load-line was a very difficult one, and had thus far puzzled the most scientific shipbuilders, because what would suit one class of ship would not suit another, and what would suit one class of cargo would not suit another. When a practical solution of the difficulty was arrived at he would give it his best consideration, but he would not consent to an ill-conceived, impracticable proposal like the present. While he felt anxious for legislation, he could not support such a measure as had been placed before the House.

MR. PEEL said, that his right hon. Friend (Mr. C. Fortescue) had been desirous to explain that he was perfectly ready to deal with this question this Session. If the whole of the large measure which had been alluded to could not be passed, his right hon. Friend would be prepared to eliminate those clauses of the Bill which referred specially to this subject, and to embody them in a separate Bill.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, that, after the assurance just given, he would not press the Motion.

DEFENCE COMMISSION—NATIONAL DEFENCES.

ADDRESS FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose to call the attention of the House to some points connected with the question of National Defences, and to move for Returns, and said: My Lords, I shall have to crave the indulgence of your Lordships in bringing this subject under your notice, as I have been suffering from severe indisposition; and if it had not been that in my postponing the subject I might have put your Lordships to some inconvenience, I would not have attempted to deal with it. In the first place, I perhaps owe some apology to your Lordships that I, a civilian, should undertake, at this early period of the Session, to deal with military matters, when I see around me so many noble Friends on both sides of the House who are far more familiar with such matters and far more competent to deal with them. My excuse is that I shall not enter into any military technicalities, but shall, I hope, confine myself to points lying within the comprehension of all of us, whether civilians or soldiers, and in which, looking to the welfare and credit of the country, we have a common interest. It would, perhaps, be unfair to avoid all mention of proposals recently submitted to Parliament by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War. In a certain sense, they appear to me to be in a right direction, and to remove some anomalies, while many of the details I heartily approve. I regard the proposals, however, as in a great degree mere patchwork, as wholly inadequate to the necessities of the time, and as one of the most extravagant schemes—looking to the worth of the money—that a so-called economical Government has ever proposed to Parliament. The proposals fail, as it appears to me, in not providing what we really require—an Army. As far as the Reserve forces are concerned, I do not profess to understand what the exact nature of the plan is as to the Volunteers; but I am afraid it falls very far short of what is required. As regards the Militia, the amount of training seems insufficient. A maximum of three months—even allowing for all the innate superiority of the British soldier—is but a poor equivalent for three years' training in Germany. Without going into detail, I must venture to express my dissent from the belief that you can possibly maintain the Militia upon purely voluntary enlistment. I will not now enter into the question in what form the principle of compulsion should be adopted; I merely express a doubt of the possibility for maintaining the Militia at the proper standard by voluntary enlistment. The right hon. Gentleman, who has introduced the Bill into the other House, talks of asking for compulsory powers in the event of an emergency. My answer is, that when the emergency arises, it will be too late to do so. As regards the Army itself, I will only say, on this occasion, that the right hon. Gentleman's proposals appear to me to be simply an addition of some 20,000 men to the standing force of the country. As my right hon. Friend, two years ago, reduced the Army by some 20,000 men, so now he increases it by 20,000, and I know of no reason why, if he remains in Office next year, he should go down to the House of Commons and propose to reduce it again. Your Lordships have to look to the enormous sum at which our military expenditure stands. I am not one of those who are in any degree disposed to grudge any sum which may be necessary; but, unless you place your military arrangements on a safe and permanent basis, I think £15,000,000 a year an extremely high, not to say an extravagant price to pay for them. I do not want to compare our system with foreign nations, but there is an obvious inequality between them. We know that Prussia maintains more than 1,000,000 of men in the field for £7,000,000 a year; that Austria maintains 700,000 or 800,000 men for about the same sum; that France, even at the same rate of expenditure as ourselves, was able to place 250,000 men in the field; and that Belgium maintains 100,000 men for £1,500,000. An obvious inequality, I say, appears when you ask this country to spend not less than £15,000,000, and do not show a greater result than the Army Estimates do at present. Were this all it would be bad enough; but you must remember that this £15,000,000 by no means covers all the necessary expenses. It leaves your Army without its proper equipment. Mr. Cardwell talks of 470,000 men; but does he mean to say that that £15,000,000 in any degree equips or maintains those 470,000 men so as to enable them to be, in every sense of the word, an Army? This, you must remember too, leaves our ports unprotected, our great towns undefended; and a night or two ago the Prime Minister informed the House of Commons that the defences of Liverpool must stand over almost sine die. And what do you get in exchange? The promise of the abolition of purchase. Now, I am not standing here to defend purchase, though I am bound to say that, so far as I remember, never has a system been more misunderstood and misrepresented. I believe the common opinion is that there is a sort of auction, and that the highest bidder obtains the commission. You ought to look very carefully to see what substitute we are to get for purchase. You are bound, above all, to see that in destroying purchase you do not destroy that which is one of the great indirect advantages of it—namely, that it causes a rapid flow of promotion to go through the Army, and secures you that which hardly any other Army in the world possesses, and which I hold to be an inestimable advantage—I mean young officers. And what are you to pay for the abolition of the existing system? It is said that it will cost you £8,000,000 or £9,000,000, and it is very questionable whether you get a fair return for it. I will not go further into my right hon. Friend's proposals, except to say that they seem to me to have this great defect—they hold out no promise or guarantee of real permanence in our military arrangements. If that be so, what is the inevitable result? It must be that we run back into the vicious circle of reductions and panics to which we have been liable for the last 25 years. One of my complaints against Her Majesty's Government is that they have encouraged this. They now propose a large addition to the Army Estimates; and what does that imply? It implies that the defences of the country are not in a satisfactory state. Yet in the autumn Mr. Cardwell told us that its defences had never been in a more satisfactory state. [Earl GRANVILLE: When?] During the autumn, at one of the numerous assemblies which the right hon. Gentleman attended. I think it was when he addressed the Ancient Druids at Oxford. What their knowledge of military matters amounts to I do not undertake to say; but he succeeded in re-assuring them, if he failed in re-assuring the country. What I complain of is that the Government surrendered themselves in the first instance to the policy of reductions at a time when they ought to have known that the whole soil of Europe was honey-

combed by secret transactions and treaties. Knowing that two great military Powers had been for years on the verge of a quarrel, they proposed these large reductions, cleared our arsenals of workmen, cut down the number of our troops, and reduced the Estimates for the Army. I complain, moreover, of the manner in which the reductions were made. If there is one principle on which all parties should agree more than another, it is that whenever reduction becomes necessary it should be made rather in unskilled than in skilled departments—obviously because the skilled branches of the service are articles of slow growth and manufacture, and cannot be extemporized at a moment's notice, no matter what the emergency. But what were these reductions? My right hon. Friend cut down the cavalry—that arm which the recent campaign has shown to be the eyes and ears of an Army, and without which vigorous operations are impossible. I believe also that the horses, in consequence of the low price given, are in many regiments far too young. In the same way he reduced the artillery. I do not intend to value the exact measure of the artillery augmentations he now proposes. It seems to me that almost in proportion as he increases it in England he appears inclined to reduce it in India. If so, the change is a mere hocus-pocus, and of no real advantage. I hope and presume, however, that the increase in England overbalances the diminution in India. So low, I believe, were the artillery cut down last year, that whenever a review or field day was ordered it was necessary for one battery to borrow horses of another. I am told that at the Wimbledon Review last summer the two batteries of horse artillery in the field had to fill up their complement by borrowing of other batteries. I speak under correction; but, certainly, this has been stated in more than one quarter. Not merely do I complain of reductions, and of the reductions being made on a false principle, but, if I may draw a further distinction, of the false economies to which Her Majesty's Government have been prone. To go into detail would be trespassing too largely on your Lordships' patience; but I will give one or two instances, which I am afraid are specimens of the rest. Two years ago a Floating Obstruction Committee sat, and reported that a large supply of torpedoes should immediately be provided. Now, your Lordships are aware that in the American Civil War torpedoes played an important part, and that there is scarcely a single Continental Power which has not long since provided itself with a supply of them. Up to the middle of last summer I believe the total number of torpedoes in store in England was one. Of course, I shall be only too glad to be corrected in any of these details—I state them as they are currently reported. Take another case. During the winter there has been a controversy in the Press with regard to the supply of powder. Now, I believe these to be the facts—The best class of powder is called pebble powder; of that, I believe, none worth mentioning is in store. The second class, which for all practical purposes is nearly as good, is pellet powder. Of that there is but a very small stock—not enough to supply us for a very short time indeed in the event of hostilities. Lastly, there is a very limited supply of ordinary powder. Now, if this statement be true, observe what the consequence is. The new guns provided at so much expense and trouble are works of art in themselves; but they cannot have their full power, or anything like it, developed unless one of the two superior classes of powder is used. That powder is said not to be in existence. They fail in nine-tenths of their power, and if you charge them with the inferior powder, in any proportion so as to make up the loss of power, that powder damages the gun. You are placed in a terrible dilemma, and after making every allowance it seems that you have not in store the primary necessity of military operations. I am told that last April works which were in process with the view of manufacturing this powder were stopped, and the manufacture itself came to an end. Again, we heard last year a great deal about breech-loaders. I understand that when the Continental War broke out the order for the manufacture had fallen off to the miserable number of 30,000. I am told, also, that when the Secretary for War spoke of 300,000 breech-loaders being in store some regiments of the Line were even at that time armed—it is hardly credible—with muzzle-loaders. One of the Highland regiments was armed, I am told, with muzzle-loaders so late as last autumn; and my belief is that a detachment of the 7th Fusiliers mounted guard last August at Portsmouth with muzzle-loaders in their hands. I will take another case. Your Lordships remember that in 1859 a very important Commission was appointed to consider the defence and fortifications of the country. They reported a few months afterwards, and the very first proposition which they laid down was that the works should be completed in the shortest possible time, as neither the Army, the Navy, nor the Reserve forces, nor all three combined, were, in their opinion, sufficient for the security of the country. Ten years elapsed; and in 1869, as I find by a Return, not one of those eight places which they recommended should be fortified were in a state of completion; and further, that the work that had been done had been done in a way not altogether satisfactory. I am informed that at Dover last August the services for the fortifications were curtailed; and that at Christmas, in the midst of a hard frost, totally inconsistent with building, orders were sent down—the country being in a state of fever as to fortifications—to proceed with the batteries immediately. Contracts were consequently entered into, and the ground prepared at a time when it was impossible the work could be properly done, in the hope, I suppose, that a certain number of guns would be mounted before the meeting of Parliament. Those guns, I believe, are not mounted now; at all events, at the end of January there was not one 7-ton gun properly mounted at Dover. I do not blame the present Government exclusively with regard to the fortifications. The Commission of 1859 recommended a certain additional amount of barrack room; but, in consequence of the other reductions made, the barrack room was reduced by one-half. Again, £1,000,000 was recommended to be expended for coast defences; but I do not think it has ever been expended. A Committee was appointed two years ago to consider what the state of these fortifications were, and under the head of “important omissions” they stated that, in estimating the powers of various works, the absence of collateral support and the facilities for attack afforded to an enemy by the omission to occupy important positions were of paramount importance; and that, in some instances, the defence was seriously jeopardized. Such is the result arrived at after spending a considerable sum. In consequence of these reductions you not only have failed, after 11 years, in completing any one of your works, but you have left many of them in such a state that the defence might be seriously jeopardized in the event of attack. There is one other point with regard to fortifications which is obvious to the most ordinary mind, and which I beg to urge most strongly. A strong recommendation of the Commission of 1859 was in favour of what they termed a Central Arsenal. They objected—and I think very wisely—to a concentration of all our military stores at one place. Well, I think for three or four years running the paltry sum of £150,000 appeared in the Estimates under this head. What has been the consequence? At this moment there is concentrated; within a narrow circle of the metropolitan district, everything which would be vital and necessary in the event of invasion. The manufactory of guns is at Woolwich, the manufactory of stores is at Enfield, the store of weapons is in the Tower, the manufactory of powder is at Waltham, even the clothing establishment is in London—in one word, everything is in or near London, and London itself is perfectly helpless, at the mercy of an invader. Is this a state of things which ought to be allowed to remain a single hour? And yet, in the face of that Report, you propose to spend £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 on the abolition of purchase. One of the first speeches I can remember, when I was first in Parliament, at the time of the Crimean War, was made by Lord Herbert, then Secretary for War, who was giving an account of the terrible disasters which had occurred. He stated that the defect of the English Army was that, however admirable its regimental organization, the Army itself was but a mere collection of regiments. Now, I doubt very much whether, when he had been two years in Office, Mr. Cardwell stated that the defences of the country were never in a better condition—whether, indeed, at this moment, anyone would venture to say that, except a few regiments at Aldershot, the Army is anything more than a collection of regiments now. I doubt whether there are at this moment stores in England sufficient to put 100,000 men, or half that number, in the field. The guns are admitted to propose to increase the maximum number of guns to 280. I believe that the number possessed by Prince Frederick Charles's army alone was 400; and I saw by an estimate the other day that the Prussians have in France alone as many batteries as we shall ultimately, when the increase has been effected, have single guns. I should like, again, to know what the Military Train is. I believe it is generally estimated that a corps de armée ought not to have less than 1,000 waggons. Have we anything like 1,000? I fear, too, whether, in the event of calling out the Militia and Volunteers, or the Militia alone and the Regular Army for training and drill, anything like sufficient barrack accommodation could be found. Yet I know that the Government have been selling barracks and barrack ground. Mr. Cardwell talks of planning defences for London, and he proposes to take money for a survey of the defensible positions round London. This is very reasonable and sensible; but the amount of money provided in the Estimates for the work is £1,000. Why, we shall have to wait another 10 years before the task is completed, and it is a sum of money thrown away. If the thing is necessary, either spend sufficient to do the work at once, or do not waste it in dribblets of this sort. I should be glad to know whether we have a supply of maps for military service? Your Lordships are perhaps aware that when Marshal MacMahon attempted his disastrous retreat maps were placed in his hands according to which he directed the march of his troops, and that he found the roads traced on them had never been completed. The Prussian authorities, on the other hand, had maps in which every farmhouse was marked, with the number of horses, and other important information carefully tabulated. Surely if they could do that for France, we ought to have equally good maps of England. This is no more than was done in 1803, when there was expectation of an invasion. All along the South Coast the Government were in full possession of all the details and resources of the country. In connection with this there is another important point on which I must say a word—it is a very great and very important subject—the subject of the military education of our officers. A Commission, appointed, I think, by the Government two years ago, inquired very fully into the matter, and took some remarkable and valuable evidence. I certainly am not one who would in any degree disparage the qualities of the English officer, for I know well what those great qualities are. Whatever may be said against our officers, let this, at least, be remembered—that they have never failed. Where courage, self-devotion, the power of winning the confidence and affection of their men are required, we are able to calculate, with mathematical certainty, on finding those great qualities in the English officers. Be careful never to impair the value of such an article as that. At the same time, every English officer would be the first to admit that in the present age war is in a very remarkable stage—that science of the highest kind is being brought to bear on every detail, and that in the German Army, to which we now look for an example in these matters, every officer is almost a professor. If the standard is raised in one Army, you must, in self-defence, raise it in another; and it is impossible to read the evidence given before that Commission by my noble Friend Lord Strathnairn, who was so long in chief command in India and in Ireland, without perceiving that this point requires immediate attention. He pointed out that while our military education has many valuable points, it falls short in that strategic instruction which is in these days vitally essential. Have Her Majesty's Government done anything in this matter? Are they prepared to do anything? I shall be told, perhaps, that military instructors have been appointed. This is a decided advantage; but regimental instruction is hardly sufficient to meet the necessities of the case. I will not weary the House by going into further details. I complain of my right hon. Friend's scheme partly for what it does, and still more for what it omits to do. I can hardly disguise what my own opinion is, though I fear it is not shared by your Lordships. I cannot help regretting that my right hon. Friend and Her Majesty's Government did not take the opportunity of offering to Parliament and the country something in the nature of military service obligatory on the population at large. This, I know, is deemed a foreign notion. My answer is, that our ancestors had it, and that foreigners imitated it from us. I may be told it is unpopular. If so, still if it is right, it was the duty of the Government to press its importance, for in the present state of the world it has become necessary. It is said that it disturbs industrial occupations; but everything is a disturbance of them. A tax of £15,000,000 is a terrible disturbance; but you might have a worse one, and anything which jeopardizes the safety and security of the country will be a disturbance far greater. I am not going to press this point; but I am honestly bound to state my opinion, and there may be a later opportunity of discussing it more fully. No mention has been made by the Secretary for War of camps for manœuvring. This may seem a detail; but it is essential that we should have camps such as they have abroad, where troops can be massed in large numbers. Officers of experience have assured me that it is there only that the weaknesses and defects of a system come out. Till that is done, and as long as you live on mere red-tape and bureau administration, so long will the defects continue. I can hardly refrain also from saying that I entertain great misgivings—though in the presence of military men I announce them with all diffidence—as to the present Control system. I know that the system of intendance, from which it was in a great measure copied, failed to a certain extent in the Crimea, to a greater extent in the campaign in Italy in 1859, and that it has failed most completely in France in the present war; but I also know that the system has the authority of very great names in this country. My noble Friend behind me is a strong supporter of it, and it saw the light very much under his auspices. I am bound to point out, however, that since it was initiated by him some changes of an enormous kind have been made in it which makes it differ considerably from its original character. According to my noble Friend's scheme the general of each district was nearly paramount. I may be wrongly informed; but I understand that the assistant controllers in different parts of the country are now in direct correspondence with the War Office. They correspond with the Controller-in-Chief, who in nine cases out of ten supports them, and the general, who ought to be the one person to give orders and be responsible, is practically shut out from the field of operations. Moreover, these assistant controllers are in many cases civilians; and this fact has an important bearing upon a second principle of vital consequence. It was recommended by the Committee, when the system was established, that while transport and all general stores should be placed under the Controller, ordnance stores—that is, ammunition and what I may call fighting stores—should be entrusted to soldiers and experts alone. This is obviously proper, for in these days of scientific warfare, when ammunition and artillery are reduced to so scientific a form, none but experts can master the technicalities of the art, and grave consequences may ensue from the want of such knowledge. I am told, indeed, that at a review of the West Kent Militia, last year, cartridges were served out by a civilian assistant controller, who, I suppose, not being very familiar with the matériel he was handling, gave the men ball cartridges instead of blank cartridges, the result being that one or two officers were very nearly shot, and the lives of the men in the front ranks very much endangered. Such ignorance as this in actual warfare would cause great confusion. It may be objected that my suggestions would involve great changes. My answer is that the changes proposed by the Government are too small, whether you measure them by the cost or by the necessity of the case. Measure them by the cost, and I ask any one who complains—and justly complains—of our great military expenditure, to calculate how much less it would cost if you could appeal to the free services and energies of every able-bodied Englishman. Measure them by the necessity of the case, and compare the state of things here with the state of things abroad. Look at those great Continental nations, passing every man through military discipline, organizing the nation in great standing camps, and arming and drilling them. People in England applaud all sorts of theories about voluntary service, and say that a system of compulsion such as prevails on the Continent would be a retrograde system, and contrary to the first principles of civilization. I agree with all that; but it will not stop what is going on abroad. By fine speeches here you cannot alter the policy of these great military Powers. All you can do is to place this country in a state of defence, and I ask you to consider how we stand in this matter. Assuming your Army to be sufficiently numerous—assuming the supply service to be sufficient—assuming the military organization to be all that you require—look for a moment at what our system of military administration is. We have a War Office in London. While in those Continental nations the War Minister is a man who is permanent, or, at all events, in office for a long succession of years, and is trained to the highest point of professional and scientific knowledge, we have here a series of gentlemen, mostly civilians, holding Office for a very short time, and generally quite unfamiliar with all military details when they accede to Office. I am not blaming the Government for this. The War Office has been in existence for 16 years, and during that time there have been eight War Ministers—giving two years as their average term. Of those eight, two only had been in the Army, and one—perhaps the ablest of all—declared that when he went to the War Office he did not know the muzzle from the butt end of a musket. Look at what the administration of the Department is and must be. It is in a state of perpetual change. Ever since I have known anything of it, endless Minutes have been written with a view to endless alterations. Endless Committees have been moved for and have sat. The War Office, moreover, is often choked with correspondence; whereas if there be an Office which prima facie should have little correspondence it is the War Office; yet I have been told that one-fourth of our official correspondence passes through it. I observe a calculation that 4,250,000 ounces of letters come to and go from it. Is it conceivable that an Office which spends its time in letter-writing can be such as you require military administration to be? The Secretary for War is perfectly helpless amid all this. He finds himself surrounded by defective organization, and very often with inadequate information and assistance. He is encumbered with questions on all sorts of details in the House of Commons, and lives in constant terror. Beyond all this, he is governed by the one predominant necessity of finance—he is influenced by the ideas of finance, which dominate for the time at the Treasury, and is driven to propose constantly economies which are of the most unsatisfactory kind. Then, while undue economy is exercised in one branch of the Department, often unnecessary waste is incurred in another—for instance, you bring home all the way from Canada a quantity of rubbish—the quality of which can scarcely be believed without its being seen. Indeed, it was not worth the expense of transport. But when you pass from the War Office and the Secretary of State to the Government itself, what do you find in their position? Why, ever since the Crimean War we have witnessed a succession of violent changes, and at present the Cabinet is without a military adviser. The result of that, of course, is, that there is, and can be, no steadiness either of action or policy in military matters. It is quite true that you may say the policy of this country is one of defence, and not of offence. In that statement I heartily concur. I wish that our armaments should be constructed in accordance with that policy. But it should be remembered that a war of defence may involve some measure also of offence, and that you are, moreover, encumbered with treaties and guarantees abroad, which at any moment may pledge you to take up a position requiring to be backed by arms. It may be said that in European complications it is our desire to be neutral. So we are, and so I trust we may remain. But we have learnt within the last 12 months that neutrality, to be effective, must be either benevolent or strong. What, my Lords, was the answer returned by the first Napoleon when the Venetians represented that they desired to be neutral? He said—"Place 50,000 men on the Adriatic and then I will consider you as neutrals and recognize your neutrality." And that is our position. Unless our neutrality be backed by military force, I believe our neutrality and representations by such a neutral Power to be absolutely worthless. All those who have watched the course of affairs must fear that if we were, unhappily, to be involved in hostilities we should find the same want of preparation which has been our invariable characteristic. That was the experience of Marlborough and of Wellington; and the historian of the Indian Mutiny records that when the Mutiny broke out no preparations had been made in India. But it must be recollected that our position now is very different from what it was in the 18th century, and that in India we had to deal only with Sepoys. And, my Lords, what was said of the Roman eagles may, I think, be said now of the Prussian eagles—that they owed their victory as much to their swiftness of flight as to their sterner qualities of war. In modern times war is declared in a few hours' notice, and woe to those who have not made their preparations long before. It may sound the language of an alarmist; but I cannot forget the words I quoted just now of that eminent Commission of 1859, appointed to consider the defence of the country; and that which the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Palmerston, and Sir John Burgoyne have all thought possible, I should certainly not be presumptuous enough to say was impossible. What we did in former days at Alexandria, what the French did when they crossed the Danube under fire, what Napoleon very nearly succeeded in doing at Boulogne in 1805, is certainly not beyond the range of possibility now. And lastly—though I say it in no sort of hostility—that which is discussed in high German military circles as a curious and interesting strategic problem—the invasion of England, deserves, at least, attention on the part of those so deeply interested in the matter as we are. I do not blame the Prussian or the German officers for discussing such subjects, nor do I blame the Government for it; but I know, as a matter of fact, that in the German portfolios there are designs and sections of every English ship of war launched, showing her guns, her armaments, her measurements, and her size. For a national army, such as the German nation now is, which makes war its profession and its study, these are all very interesting and curious problems; but we, on our side, ought, at all events, to be prepared. Anyhow, let us not forget what have been the lessons of the last six months. We have learnt, at all events, this—how, in the 19th century, in spite of the progress of civilization, like thunder in a clear sky, a declaration of war may be pronounced in a few hours. We have seen, also, how, in a few hours after the declaration of war, large forces and tremendous agencies, guided by intelligence of the very highest order, may be set in motion; we have seen how victory attached itself irresistibly to that Power which had known how to prepare beforehand for the contest, and we have seen how vain have been the efforts of hastily-armed and ill-trained levies. And we have seen the utter misery—transcending the language any man can use—worthy only of a prophecy out of the Book of Revelations—which has fallen upon the men, women, and children of the conquered country, destroying the industry and happiness of years. I have no wish to exaggerate in this matter. I am afraid it is in vain to appeal to Her Majesty's Government. They have systematically—I do not say designedly, but through long miscalculation of the temper of the country—they have spoken smooth things when the horizon was in reality cloudy and threatening: like the oracles of old, they have deceived others until they have ended by deceiving themselves. I do not appeal to the peace-at-any-price party—they are happily a small minority—but the English people, whose common sense never fails them, and who know how much they would, one and all, high and low, rich and poor, lose if this country were to receive a shock, or its security were endangered, look for something more. During last autumn a Member of Her Majesty's Government, in addressing his constituents on this subject, said he trusted no great time would be wasted in Parliament in talk on military matters. With that hope I disagree entirely. I hope and trust that Parliament will be so far alive to the feeling of the country as to spare no time or trouble in discussing and considering matters in which not only the credit and honour, but the very security and prosperity of the country are at stake.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Returns of the number of places which it was recommended by the Defence Commission, 1859, should be fortified, and of which the fortifications are now complete: the number of tents and tent equipages now in store, exclusive of officers and hospital tents: the amount of barrack accommodation in England and Scotland, specified according to districts and counties: the barracks and barrack grounds sold or disposed of within the last two years."—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

LORD NORTHBROOK: My Lords, although my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) was kind enough to give me notice that his speech would have a wider scope than the mere words of his

Notice would seem to indicate, I cannot proceed to make the observations which occur to me, in answer to my noble Friend, without venturing, as a very young Member of your Lordships' House, to suggest that there is a great objection to answering a speech made in the House of Commons by a speech in this House, and that nothing can be more inconvenient than for your Lordships to discuss Estimates which have not yet been brought under consideration in the House of Commons. Both these things, however, have been done by my noble Friend this evening. I shall endeavour, as far as I am able, to extract from the somewhat loose statements made by my noble Friend, and from the mass of incidents which he has crowded one upon another, what my noble Friend conceives to be the policy which the Government ought to adopt, and what he conceives to be amiss in the proposals of the Government. I believe I am correct in saying that we are accused of having recklessly reduced the Army by discharging 20,000 old soldiers, who, at the rate of £100 a year each, represent the saving of £2,000,000 which is shown on a comparison of the Estimates of 1870 with those of the year 1868. Then it is said that the Government had to replace these 20,000 experienced soldiers by 20,000 recruits in the autumn of last year, thereby adding again to the Estimates the sum of £2,000,000 which had been previously taken off; the result being that the Government had been forced to revert to the military policy of their predecessors, and had only imperfectly re-established our military force in the condition in which it stood in the year 1868. I think I am describing the attack as fairly and as strongly as I can. In the first place, I wish to induce your Lordships, if I can, to discard from your minds the notion that the calculation which has been constantly referred to here and "elsewhere," that every soldier costs £100, and that, consequently, to discharge 20,000 men effects a saving of £2,000,000 in the Estimates, is correct. The calculation has not the slightest foundation in fact. My noble Friend opposite has been constantly referring to the Army Estimates for this year, and perhaps he will allow me also to refer to them for a moment. If the Votes which comprise the cost of the pay, provisions, clothing, and all other attributes of the men themselves for this year be compared with the same Votes of last year, it will be seen that out of the whole increase of £2,886,000 in the Army Estimates of this year about £1,000,000 only depends upon the increased number of men. Your Lordships will see that for 20,000 men that is just £50, instead of £100, a man. The noble Earl behind me (Earl Granville) in replying the other night to some remarks which had been made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond), expressed an opinion that the cost of a soldier of the Line was about £40 a year. My noble Friend was perfectly correct; according to a Parliamentary Return, the average annual cost of 1,000 rank and file of Infantry of the Line serving in Great Britain,—including the pay of officers and non-commissioned officers, clothing, commissariat charges and allowances is given at £40,000. I trust, therefore, the statement that a soldier costs £100 a year will never be brought forward again in any discussion on military affairs. And now I come to the main question—were the reductions made in 1869 and 1870 reckless reductions? It has been asserted that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War came into Office with the avowed object of effecting retrenchment; and my noble Friend who has just addressed your Lordships used language which I think had better have been uttered in the presence of my right hon. Friend than behind his back. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) asserted among other things that my right hon. Friend was governed by the one predominant necessity of finance. Such statements as this, however, are utterly inconsistent with the declared policy of the Government and with the facts of the case. In the first place, they are inconsistent with the assertions publicly and deliberately given by Her Majesty's Government and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War in the other House. The other day it was noticed that in the paragraph in Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne, relating to the Estimates for the present year, no remark was made in reference to their having been framed with a view to economy. This, however, was by no means inconsistent with Her Majesty's Speech in 1870, in which it was stated that the Estimates—

Thus the primary object announced in 1870 was the maintenance of effective establishments, and it is not correct to say, as the noble Lord has done, that efficiency was disregarded in the deliberations of Her Majesty's Government. I challenge any noble Lord opposite to point out any statement made at any time, either in or out of Parliament, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War to the effect that his mission was to reduce the Army and retrench the public expenditure without reference to the efficiency of the service; yet these were the words used the other day by the noble Duke opposite in regard to Mr. Cardwell—"He came into Office with the avowed object of retrenchment."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I quoted the words from a letter written by Lord Russell to the newspapers, in which he said that Mr. Cardwell's policy was retrenchment, and that he had done his best to carry it out.

LORD NORTHBROOK: I have no wish to misrepresent the noble Duke; but surely the words fairly bear the interpretation I have placed upon them. The noble Duke must be aware that the opinion of Earl Russell could be no evidence of the intentions of Mr. Cardwell, who had himself said in public, when moving the Army Estimates last year, that—

"Saving effected by the sacrifice of efficiency is not economy. . . . But, on the other hand, I contend that economy, when not pushed beyond the proper limit, is in itself an element of efficiency, and that without true economy efficiency can seldom exist."—[8 Hansard, cxcix. 1160.]

I trust I have now convinced your Lordships that the assertion that the reductions have been reckless is contrary to the declared policy of the Government and of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War; and I must now ask your Lordships to consider for a moment whether those reductions have or have not been reckless in point of fact. From the first, Her Majesty's Government announced a distinct policy in regard to the reduction of the Army; and that policy I had the honour to explain at some length in this House last Session in answer to Earl Russell, who, I regret to say, has not yet been able to appear in his place this year. I then endeavoured to explain that policy to be one of concentrating the forces of the Empire. Instead of allowing the forces to be quartered in driblots in different parts of the Empire, it was resolved to mass at home a large portion of our troops, so that they might be at once available when required. That policy was not a new one. It was recommended by the Committee appointed by the other House in 1861, and it was advocated by some of the highest authorities on military affairs. Nevertheless that policy was never thoroughly carried out till the accession of the present Government, when it was adopted under the auspices of the noble Earl, who was then Secretary of State for the Colonies (Earl Granville). The result has been that if we compare the years 1868 and 1870 we find that the number of troops in the Colonies has been reduced by 25,000 men, and the net expenditure in the Colonies proper, omitting the garrisons, has been reduced by £1,164,000. Now, I know many of your Lordships will agree with me in thinking that the policy of concentrating our forces at home has been advantageous to the Empire; for a concentrated force is clearly more powerful than one which is severed and distributed. I believe it also to have been beneficial to Colonies themselves, by inducing them to rely more on their own exertions; for the withdrawal of the Imperial forces has led them to raise levies with which they could, at all events in the first instance, undertake the task of defending themselves when attacked. At the same time, it is clear that the real defence of the Colonies is the fact of this country possessing a naval superiority over all the other nations of the world. I have said that the policy of concentrating troops at home was, in the first place, advantageous to the Empire at large, and, in the second, advantageous to the Colonies themselves; and I say also that it was advantageous to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It has given us greater strength at home, coupled with a diminution of the expenses of the Army—a consideration which even in this House is not to be lost sight of. My noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon), when he was Minister for the Colonies, deliberately carried out the policy I have been explaining: at any rate, when he came to discuss the matter with my noble Colleague behind me (Earl Granville) the differences between them were very minute.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I have not made a single remark this evening about the concentration of troops in England, and I am not aware that the word "Colony" or the word "colonial" escaped my lips.

LORD NORTHBROOK: I believe that to be quite true; but the very fact shows that the noble Earl has not looked at the question as a whole, and that he has omitted even to allude to the cardinal point of the policy which he is now attacking. It is impossible to discuss the military policy of the Government without dealing with the concentration of troops, upon which it chiefly depends. Therefore it is not my fault that I have alluded to the question, but it is his that he has overlooked it. Now, what has been the effect of our policy upon our military strength at home?—a vital point in the discussions of the last six months. The noble Earl opposite believes that the reductions were carried out in an improper manner, because artillery, and cavalry require longer training than infantry, and these forces ought to be reduced with the greatest reluctance. But will your Lordships believe that all the foundation for the attack is that the cavalry at home were reduced from 8,949 rank and file in 1868, to 8,762 in 1870, being a diminution of 187; and that the artillery at home were reduced from 12,015 rank and file in 1868 to 11,690 in 1870, being a diminution of 325? The reduction in both those arms of the service therefore amount only to about 500 men. The noble Earl made some remarks about the strength of the artillery last year, and the field force at the Wimbledon Review. Last Session I had a statement about the field force at Wimbledon which I carried about with me day after day in order to be prepared to answer a Question, fully expecting that one would be asked in this House; such a Question, however, was never put; and as, of course, I did not expect the information would be called for now, I have not the paper with me; but a gallant Friend opposite, to whom I showed the statement at the time, and who is a much greater authority than I can pretend to be, was perfectly satisfied that the statement disposed of the attacks about the constitution of the field force at Wimbledon. Did we in other ways reduce the force in a reckless manner? Certainly not. We did not reduce a single British regiment nor a cadre of a single battalion of the British Army; and I do not think the noble Earl, however disposed to criticize, would cite in support of the charge the reduction of two West India regiments, of the Canadian Rifles, and of the Cape Mounted Rifles—forces which I do not wish to disparage, which were broken up for political or other reasons, but which did not add to the defensive force of this country, and the loss of which could not be seriously accounted a diminution of the military strength of Great Britain. As to our discharging veterans we did not recklessly get rid of any who desired to remain, and who could be advantageously retained. The fact is, the men who were discharged were men whose term of service had nearly expired and who declined to re-engage, and men of worthless character; and the highest military authority, the illustrious Duke on the cross Benches, has given his opinion that the result of the reductions was that the battalions were in a more solid state than they were before the reductions took place. A curious illustration of the effect of the reductions is to be seen in a Paper recently laid upon the Table of the House—the Report upon the Military Prisons for 1869—in which the diminution of military prisoners is greatly attributed to the expulsion from the Army of “men hardened in a career of vice.” If such was the result of the reductions, no one can say that they were recklessly made. As the speech of my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) was an indictment against Her Majesty’s Government upon the policy they have pursued, and as it is a subject upon which, during the Recess, there has been much misrepresentation, I hope your Lordships will bear with me if I endeavour to explain the inaccuracies into which he has fallen. What, then, has been the effect of the reductions upon the force at home in 1870, before the increase of August, as compared with the force at home in the year 1868? Dealing with the Regulars of all ranks, the strength of the establishment in 1868 was 87,505, and in 1870 it was 89,051. I will not compare the Reserves, except to say generally that whereas in 1868 their numbers were 3,545, in 1870 they were 21,900. Your Lordships will see that in 1870, after a reduction in expenditure of £2,000,000, we had in this country a larger and more powerful force than we had in 1868. I now come to the allegation of the noble Earl that what we did by increasing the Army last year was simply to place ourselves in the same position in which we stood in 1868. Surely, however, if our strength at home was greater after the reductions than before it was not necessary to add 20,000 men to the Army to bring it up to its previous position. But the circumstances of the country in the autumn were entirely different from what they were either in 1868 or 1869; and if we are told that the Army must always be the same whatever the surrounding circumstances may be—whether there be a profound peace or whether the nations of Europe be engaged in deadly conflict, then I say no such doctrine has ever before been maintained in this or in any other country. In Prussia, for example, the keystone of the military system is low establishments in time of peace and high establishments in time of war; and unless that rule be recognized in this country, we shall have constant complaints of lavish expenditure and reckless reductions in consequence. It was considered necessary that an increase should be made in the Army in the autumn of last year; but that increase raised our strength at home far above that of 1868. The comparison of the establishments of the two years is really most striking. The rank and file of the cavalry in 1868 numbered 8,949, and in 1870 they numbered 10,422. The artillery in 1868 were 12,015, and in 1870 they were 16,408. The field artillery may be considered to have been almost doubled. It was said by those who had only imperfect information to rely upon that the increase of artillery at home was obtained at the expense of India; but the strength of the rank and file of artillery in India remained as before. The rank and file of infantry, which were 35,580 in 1868, will be 53,150 this year. Therefore your Lordships will see that the allegation that by the addition of 20,000 men in August last we merely placed ourselves in the same position that we were in in 1868 is entirely erroneous. So much has been said about the difficulty of obtaining recruits, that, although my noble Friend did not allude to the subject, I may, perhaps, be allowed to make a short statement. The number recruited since August 1, 1870, has amounted to 26,155, and the casualties during that time amounted to 7,804.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE wished to know how many of the recruits were for the short period of enlistment? ["Hear!"]

LORD NORTHBROOK understood that cheer, and would advert to the subject of short enlistments by-and-by. The net increase in the Army during the period referred to had been 18,351. The number of short enlistments had been 3,383. There were some remarkable facts connected with this recruiting. It used to be considered utterly preposterous to suppose that a system of recruiting could be carried on without bounty. Well, bounty was abolished last June; the whole of these recruits, therefore, were obtained without bounty, and—what is still more satisfactory—although these recruits were sent to the depôts without escort, the percentage of desertions was less than it had ever been under the old system. The rate of recruiting during the last six months was nearly the largest that we have ever had. The largest number of recruits in any one year from the civil population, and the disembodied Militia, was in 1858. The number of recruits in that year was 53,000—about 1,000 per week. But, without bounty, we have come up to about the same number of recruits, although no great inducements were held out last year, as in 1858, to the disembodied Militia to join the Army.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND asked whether the standard had not been lowered?

LORD NORTHBROOK: The standard was lower in 1858 than in 1870. For some regiments it was then as low as 5 feet 3 inches. It is the opinion of the Inspector General of recruiting that the recruiting during last autumn was as satisfactory as it could possibly be under the circumstances. With regard to this subject, a Report will be laid on the Table which will afford to your Lordships a good deal of interesting information. With regard to the Control system, the noble Earl appears to be under some misapprehension, which is the more remarkable as it was one of the measures introduced by Sir John Pakington when at the War Office; and the Conservative Government, in which the noble Earl held Office, took credit for it in the Queen's Speech before the dissolution of the last Parliament.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON begged pardon for interrupting; but Sir John Pakington was not at the War Office, but at the Admiralty when he was at the Colonial Office. When the Control system was brought forward he was not in Office.

LORD NORTHBROOK: I entirely acquit the noble Earl of any share in the responsibility for initiating the Control system. I had forgotten the unfortunate separation that occurred between the noble Earl and his Colleagues. My noble Friend is quite in error if he supposes that the Controller is independent of the general officer commanding a district. That was the error of the French intendance, and has been avoided in the Control regulations, by which the general officer is made the supreme authority. My noble Friend has related an anecdote about ball and blank cartridges. The story has been told before, but the mistake had nothing whatever to do with the Control department, for the officer who made the mistake did not belong to the Control department, but was one of the officers of the old department. My noble Friend also indulged in some criticisms on the general principles of the administration of the Army; but I was not able to gather what remedy he would suggest to correct the ill consequences to which he adverted. Of course, we all know that in the changes in the Government of this country it rarely or ever happens that the Secretary of State for War, who is responsible for the administration of the Army, can be a soldier of distinction; and we also know that, owing to those changes, the responsible Minister rarely remains in Office for a great length of time. It must also be admitted that in respect to the great Departments of the Army and Navy, civilians, who had no practical acquaintance with those services, must feel great difficulty on being placed at the head of the Departments. Still, as long as constitutional government prevails in this country, it would not be easy to provide a remedy for the inconvenience which undoubtedly exists in that respect. What has been done by the Secretary of State for War appears to be the best thing that could be done under the circumstances. He has by an Order in Council divided the business of the Army into three distinct departments, and has placed a responsible chief at the head of each; and when my noble Friend says that there is no military adviser at the War Office I will inform him that my right hon. Friend has placed, by an Order in Council, the illustrious Duke on the cross Benches—the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief—in that position. Without dwelling more on these administrative questions I shall be prepared, on all proper occasions, to defend the arrangements made in the War Office, which have been settled with the view of defining duties and fixing responsibility. In the end an economy of more than £50,000 will be obtained by the reductions which have been made in the War Office by my right hon. Friend. My noble Friend made some remarks to the effect that the Secretary of State for War is at a loss to know where to turn to obtain accurate information; but I believe that he is perfectly satisfied with the information he receives from those who are responsible for the several departments, and has found great relief in respect to the weight of his duties by the alteration, which placed responsible chiefs at the head of different departments, and I rejoice that he will now have the advantage of the assistance in the other House of that distinguished officer Sir Henry Storks. My noble Friend made some observation on the subject of stores, and I am glad to say that he did not assert that we were careless with respect to the provision of great guns. With respect to gunpowder, the noble Earl said that the powder we had there was so defective in quality it was impossible to use it with safety or satisfaction.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: What I meant to say was this—that the best kind of powder in store existed in such small quantities that I might say it scarcely existed at all. By the use of the inferior powder the gun would lose about nine-tenths of its propelling power, and it would act most injuriously on the new guns.

LORD NORTHBROOK: I admit that there is a difficulty in getting sufficient and adequate powder at once to suit the new guns; I ask how is it possible, with respect to a new kind, upon which a Committee has just reported, that there should be a large quantity in store? If a new sort of manufacture be introduced, machinery must be got for it; and if my noble Friend asserts that any delay has taken place with respect to the manufacture of this gunpowder, I shall be happy to meet him on that question on a future occasion. As to the amount of powder in stock I will at once tell your Lordships how we stand, for there is nothing to conceal in the matter. We have of the L. G. (large grain) powder, 214,536 barrels; of the R. L. G. (rifled large grain) powder, 66,075 barrels; of the pebble powder, 564 barrels; and of the pellet powder, which we have abandoned, 149 barrels. Now, of the R. L. G. powder—which is admitted to be good and efficient for the large guns—we have twice as much in store as was consumed during the siege of Sebastopol, where, I believe, the consumption was under 30,000 barrels. I, therefore, hope the noble Earl will set his mind at ease as to the supply of gunpowder. I pass now to the subject of breech-loading arms, and must say I am surprised that my noble Friend should come here with the old story as to what the Secretary of State said in the other House during the autumn of last year. The statement then made by my right hon. Friend was strictly accurate.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I said nothing as to its accuracy or inaccuracy. I merely stated that there was at that time in the North of England a regiment still armed with muzzle-loaders, and another similarly armed in the South.

LORD NORTHBROOK: There are ways of stating a thing so as to produce a certain impression, and I appeal to noble Lords around me whether the statement of my noble Friend did not seem intended for the purpose of throwing some degree of discredit on the statement of the Secretary of State. Now, as his representative in this House, I cannot pass by such an allusion, and will give it what I think must be accepted as a complete answer. Every word in the statement made by my right

hon. Friend in the other House was strictly accurate. At the same time, it is possible there might then have been a regiment somewhere in the North of England, and another at Portsmouth or elsewhere, armed only with muzzle-loaders. Everyone is aware of the practice regulating the supply of breech-loaders to troops for service in India. My right hon. Friend had stated in the House of Commons, only a few days before the answer to which my noble Friend referred, that some of the regiments stationed in India were still armed with muzzle-loaders; that recruits sent out to join their regiments were not provided with arms, but regiments proceeding to India carried with them the Snider rifle. The regiment at Warley or at Portsmouth alluded to by my noble Friend was simply a regiment just returned from India, and in a few days it would have received the breech-loading arms. Anything, therefore, approaching to the allegation that our Regular forces at home were not armed with breech-loaders is entirely contrary to the facts of the case. My noble Friend, indeed, is very unfortunate when he deals with breech-loading arms. In the autumn he made an interesting speech at an agricultural association in his own county, and said he doubted whether a single regiment of Militia was armed with breech-loaders.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I was misreported.

LORD NORTHBROOK: Of course, I accept that explanation; but I think it is somewhat unfortunate that on a subject of such importance the correction was not made at the time. Another question alluded to by my noble Friend was that of our fortifications. What, he asked, is the reason why these great and important works—these real safeguards of the country—are not yet completed? Simply because it is not possible, by the mere word of a Minister, to create or to complete such gigantic works. My noble Friend calls upon us in the spirit of the old lines—

“Ye Gods! annihilate but space and time,
And make two lovers happy!”

If we could have annihilated space and time and made these forts as with the wand of a magician, we should have been only too glad to have done so. But the cause of the delay is a perfectly simple one. In 1859 there was no bigger gun than the old 68-pounder, weighing some

5 tons. Since then the weight of our guns has gradually increased, first we had a 7-ton gun, then an 18-ton gun, next a 25-ton gun, until now we have a 35-ton gun. What would have been thought if these works had been hastily completed for an armament of 5-ton guns, and in the meantime these large guns had come into use? That is the real fact with regard to these fortifications. One change after another has taken place. We have been living in a period of great and rapid transition. Only the other day the Moncrieff gun-carriage was invented, and it may, perhaps, be still further improved. Such inventions give rise to great changes, and involve considerable delay, though they may lead to great and permanent advantages. However, I hope the Return to be furnished respecting the present condition of these fortifications will give all the information required, and your Lordships will see that, though not practically completed along the whole coast, yet, on several of the most important points of the coast, they will give an effectual protection to our dockyards—the great naval arsenals of this country. My noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) read an opinion from some professional authority respecting these fortifications, which are pronounced in some place or other to be insufficient. Not knowing the particular work alluded to, and not being an Engineer officer, I cannot profess to argue the matter, or to give a practical opinion on the point at issue. All I can say is that the opinion quoted by my noble Friend is not shared by an officer who will be recognized as one of the highest authorities on the Continent upon questions of this nature: Colonel Brialmont, of the Belgian service, who carried out the fortifications of Antwerp, expressed to Colonel Jervois, the able officer in charge of these works, the highest opinion as to their merits, and stated that he looked upon this country as being in advance of the other nations of Europe in works of fortification. I hope that opinion will weigh with greater force than that of the authority quoted by my noble Friend. Then my noble Friend asked why, after a Committee had reported in favour of torpedoes, we had not a supply of them in store? But what would have been the use of having an enormous store of torpedoes ready in the course of last year? Was there any probability of our having to use any one of them? If the torpedoes had been made immediately after the Report of the Committee to which my noble Friend refers, the consequence would have been what has so frequently happened in similar cases—that a pattern, tolerably good for the time being, would have been manufactured in considerable quantities, and then a better pattern having been obtained, the money previously spent would have been wasted. What has actually been done is much better; we have set about ascertaining the proper character of torpedoes, and a certain number of them will be immediately prepared. All the necessary stores which cannot be bought at short notice will be purchased; and the manufacture of gun-cotton, which cannot be obtained in the market at short notice, will be proceeded with. As to those stores which can be easily procured at any time, we shall wait till the occasion arises, and we shall then, in a few days, be able to supply any number of torpedoes for the defence of our harbours and ports. The necessary plans of defence will be kept ready. We shall merely want certain materials which can be easily supplied. Upon the general question of the sufficiency of our supplies I will state the opinion of one of our most experienced and distinguished Artillery officers, the Director of Stores, General Adye, who has informed the Secretary of State that our arsenals and depôts have reserves of all kinds in abundance, and that, in his opinion, as far as relates to munitions and military equipments, we now stand better prepared for war than we have been at any period within his recollection. So much for the attack made by my noble Friend upon the administration of the Army during the last two years. My noble Friend quoted, evidently from recollection, an expression which he attributed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War at a meeting of the Druids' Society at Oxford—that this country never was in a more complete state of defence than it was in the autumn of last year. Now, possibly that opinion is a true one—I do not wish to discuss the point—but the remark was never made by my right hon. Friend. During the speech of my noble Friend I have had an opportunity of communicating with my right hon. Friend, and the remark he made was different from that attributed to him. What he said was that, as regards the effective force at home last autumn, it was greater, as he believed, than it had been in any one year since 1815, excepting at the conclusion of the Crimean War. I think it right to correct the misapprehension into which my noble Friend has fallen upon this point. And now, my Lords, I come to the part of my noble Friend's speech, in which he attacked the present policy of Her Majesty's Government. With regard to the charge of extravagance brought against that policy, as my noble Friend did not propose any counter plan, nor adduce any particular instance of this extravagance, I am equally unable to consider his plan, or to answer his observations. But my noble Friend appears to me to have never touched upon the point which really lies at the root of all questions connected with the organization of our Army, and that is—"What is it you want your Army to do?" My noble Friend said something about "benevolent neutrality;" but I would ask my noble Friend, does he mean that we are to change, or that we are not to change the policy which this country has pursued with respect to military affairs ever since the Peace of 1815? That policy, as I understand it, is that we should keep up a naval force of great strength and efficiency, and with it a moderate Army, one in no way equal to the great forces maintained during the whole of that period by many of the great military Powers of Europe. Are we to alter this system, or are we to adapt it to the circumstances of the time? As far as I could gather from the speech of my noble Friend, although it was difficult to extract a positive opinion on that part of the subject, he would alter that policy. But if we are to alter it nothing short of a conscription on the largest scale—carried to the extent it is done in Prussia—coupled with enormous Estimates, would suffice. If, on the other hand, we are to adopt our policy to the altered circumstances of the time, in what point are our proposals deficient? We have heard during the Recess arguments from many quarters, and my noble Friend has spoken to-day, although I think he said he would not press it, in favour of compulsory service. What does he mean by saying that he would not press it?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I think I merely said I would not at this moment force the discussion on that head. I do not think I said anything more.

LORD NORTHBROOK: But, my Lords, it is a very inconvenient thing to make statements upon any subject, and then to say we are not to have any discussion on the subject. Am I to understand that my noble Friend wishes to press compulsory service on the country? If my noble Friend does press compulsory service on the country, then he must, I think, show reasons far stronger than he has adduced to-night before we accept it. And for what would the compulsory service be? I can understand any person proposing compulsory service for the Army; but, as I understood my noble Friend, that was not his proposal.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I never for one moment dreamt of compulsory service for the Army.

LORD NORTHBROOK: I did not suppose that that was my noble Friend's meaning. In adopting compulsory service for the Army you would have a broad, intelligible, and active principle to act upon; for by such a conscription you would have a powerful Army and be able to command a force of men equal to the forces of Prussia or of France, and able to carry out any policy which this country might deem desirable on the Continent of Europe. But if I rightly understand the position my noble Friend now takes, it is one in favour of compulsion, but not for the Army. But the whole of these military measures are intended to raise, not a militia, or a volunteer army, but an army of soldiers. And what would be the advantage of resorting to the compulsion of the ballot for the Militia? The reports issued by commanding officers of Militia show that they can obtain under the system of voluntary enlistment all the recruits they want; and the only result, therefore, of resorting to the Ballot would be to substitute unwilling for willing Militiamen. It is difficult to go into the question of the Ballot on an occasion like this, when we have no scheme before us. I do not know whether my noble Friend proposes substitutes or no substitutes, or to change entirely a voluntary for a compulsory force; but this I will undertake to say—that the argument advanced by my noble Friend in favour of the Ballot will not be sustainable when the discussion takes place. Putting aside the question of compulsory service, it appears to me that one of the main principles of Army Organization is the maintenance of a sufficient Reserve, and as the system of short service upon which the maintenance of such a Reserve depends is one of the cardinal points in the scheme proposed by Her Majesty's Government, I would like to ask my noble Friend in what particular does he deem the Government proposal insufficient? The principle of short service is the principle on which all depends—it is one of the cardinal points of the scheme, and I hope that when it comes before your Lordships—with the experience of last year—it will receive your cordial assent. I can assure the noble Earl that all these subjects have been carefully considered, and that calculations have been made of the number of men who will probably be brought into the ranks of the Army Reserve by a system of enlistment for three years in the Army and nine years in the Reserve. I believe that the additional numbers brought in by this means will in a short time produce a very effective Army Reserve, and that it will consist ultimately of no fewer than 100,000 men. It is obvious that if we take steps to obtain an Army Reserve of that magnitude another most important alteration is necessary. The cadres of the Infantry battalions will require to be considerably increased, and we must have greater elasticity in the organization of our Army. Having a small peace establishment, we should then be able on an emergency to place trained men in the ranks, and complete a force of infantry very much larger than we have at present. Another point to which we attach the greatest importance is that the Militia recruits shall be thoroughly trained when they first enter the service. Our proposal is that they should be trained for a period of three months after their enlistment, and it has been favourably received by many colonels of Militia whose opinions have been asked on the feasibility of the measure. My noble Friend thinks three months not sufficient; but I believe that recruits for Her Majesty's Household Troops have only four months' training before they are put in the ranks. If so, surely three months' training will be sufficient for Militia recruits. Again, we hope by the changes which will ensue from the abolition of the purchase system to find a remedy for the existing defects in regard to Militia officers. With respect to the Volunteers, we propose to insist on greater efficiency, especially in reference to the qualifications of officers. This is not the proper occasion for dilating on these points, but I mention them in passing in order to show that none of the principal branches of the service have escaped the notice of Her Majesty's Government. There can be no doubt that the general re-organization of the Regular Army is a matter of primary importance at the present time. No one can more heartily agree than I do with the eloquent panegyric pronounced by my noble Friend on the glories and the merits of the British Army; but the experience of great wars constantly alter the organization and tactics of armies; while, as military writers say, the great principles of strategy have remained unchanged from the time of Cæsar to the present day. Now, it certainly appears to me wise and necessary to take advantage of the knowledge gained by the terrible experience of other nations in order to apply all improvements to our own organization. No one can be more sensible of this than my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and not one of the points referred to by my noble Friend has escaped his attention, or that of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. My noble Friend asked me what was going to be done in reference to the education of officers. My reply is, that much has been done already, and that the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon Military Education have, in all substantial respects, been carried out. The illustrious Duke on the cross Benches issued on the 1st of August, 1870, a General Order laying down the conditions of the education of officers and the subjects they were to qualify themselves in for promotion from one rank to another. These conditions, I may remark, were almost identical with those recommended by the Commissioners. The illustrious Duke has also continuously directed his attention to improvements in field fortification, and fresh instructions have been issued on that subject. A Committee has also investigated the subject of an Intelligence department. I will not now discuss the Estimates, but as to the survey of the district round London it will be found that more than the sum mentioned by my noble Friend has been taken for that purpose. Having thus shown that we are prepared to utilize to the utmost the lessons derived from the experience of other nations, I wish to say a few words concerning the combination of all our forces. Up to the present time everything has been done which the law permitted to effect such a combination; but the state of the law has prevented the Government from going farther than they have done. If it were desirable to give greater elasticity to the British infantry, which appears to me to be almost essential with short service, and to have three battalions to each regiment, with such arrangements that it would be easy to transfer men from one battalion to another so as to complete regiments for service; if, on the other hand, we wished to combine the Militia with the Line regiments in such a way as that they should form part of a harmonious and uniform system, united by local names, or by conditions of service, and so giving to the auxiliary forces the great benefits of the regimental system, which has been rightly considered one of the greatest merits of the British Army; in either of those cases we find, with regard to the Regular Army, that we are stopped entirely by the system of purchase, and, in regard to the auxiliary forces, we are stopped altogether by their being placed by Act of Parliament under the command of Lords Lieutenant of counties. In the opinion of the Government the changes necessary in order that these forces shall be bound together are the abolition of the purchase system and the resumption of the command of the Militia by the Crown; and both these form part of the scheme of the Government. Therefore, whether you look, first, to the establishment of short service in the Army; second, to the better training of the Militia; third, to the proper efficiency of the Volunteer forces; fourth, to the completing and improving of the organization of the Army and its tactical efficiency; or, fifth, to the combination of the whole; there is not one point with which the scheme of the Government fails to deal. It would be inexpedient now to raise a discussion on the question of purchase; it would be better to defer such discussion until the Bill is before your Lordships. All these changes produce what I may call a radical reform in many branches of the Army; and in the preparation of these measures the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief has cordially assisted the Government, giving them all the support they could desire. Holding the position I do it would not be right of me to abstain from saying this; and I believe I may add that the illustrious Duke entirely agrees with the proposals of the Government. The key of the speech of my noble Friend is that he wished to avoid hot and cold fits in respect of military affairs—improper economy one day and panic another; and he appears to think that the responsibility for these things rests only upon those who are for the time being responsible for the administration of the Army. But my noble Friend's indictment applies, in every count, equally to the Administration of which he was a member, and, indeed, to every Administration for the last 20 years; and it is absurd to suppose that the short intervals of Conservative Administration have sufficed to keep alive the British Army. I venture to say, moreover, that responsibility attaches to others—namely, to the Leaders in both Houses of the Opposition to Her Majesty's Government for those fits and panics, and no one has been so great a culprit in this particular as Mr. Disraeli. What has he done in two of the greatest crises in which the military administration of this country has found itself placed? In 1857, just after the expiration of the Crimean War, when the question of military expenditure was brought before the country, he lent the whole weight of his influence as the Leader of the Conservative party to a movement for the reduction of the Estimates to the standard of 1853. Again, in 1862, when a contest of a different character had been brought to a conclusion, Mr. Disraeli gave utterance to one of those epigrammatical expressions which are never forgotten; he attacked what he called the "bloated armaments" of this country. But those "bloated armaments" of 1862 were in strength very much like those which have lately been considered entirely insufficient; and which, only the other day, he characterized in words quite as epigrammatical—as "skeleton battalions and attenuated squadrons"—and that notwithstanding that the strength of the Army at home, for the defence of these isles, even before the recent increase, was greater than when he himself ceased to hold the office of Prime Minister. It seems to me that the responsibility of the leaders of public opinion who do not belong to the Government is very great, and I wish I could acquit my noble Friend opposite from being a culprit of the same kind; but I must remind him of a speech he made in the provinces during the Recess. He thinks he is making amiable comments when he is really saying most violent and cutting things. He proposes nothing himself, but says he is dreadfully surprised at hearing Mr. Cardwell's statements, and that he is not satisfied with half-and-half recommendations and milk-and-water principles. I complain that statements are made by my noble Friend and others who, having occupied positions of high importance in public affairs, are looked to as leaders of opinion in this country, without sufficient information; and while they are ready to criticize and accept for the purpose of criticism any statement from whatever quarter it may come, they are willing to give no credit to those who are entrusted with the responsibility of the administration of a department while Parliament is not sitting. So far from believing that the proposals made by the Government for the organization of the Army are insufficient or extravagant, I believe that, when your Lordships consider the measure itself, you will be of the opinion that those proposals have been framed not only with due regard to the necessities of this country, but also with due regard for that economy without which no military measures can have a permanent character. My Lords, I have only in conclusion to say with respect to the Returns for which the noble Earl moved, that there will be no objection to produce them with a slight modification in the first, showing what progress has been made in the works of fortification, instead of simply showing whether they are complete or not. My Lords, I have to thank the House most sincerely for the kind attention they have paid to me in fulfilling a task of great difficulty, having had to deal with questions partly of great principles and partly of minute detail without that preparation beforehand which it would have been much more satisfactory to me to have given, because I should then have been able to condense my remarks within a space and time not so unreasonably inconvenient to your Lordships.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I hope I may be allowed to say a few words on this important subject. The subject is so difficult that a good deal has been said on both sides as to what ought and what ought not to be done. I certainly have no wish to enter into the controversy in any way; but, as in the position which I have the honour to hold I am in a great measure responsible for the efficiency of the Army, it would ill become me to allow such a subject to pass without making a few observations. But they shall be very few, and for this reason—that I think questions of this sort will be much more easily and satisfactorily discussed when we have the proposed measure before us. I am sure my noble Friend will excuse me for the observation; but I confess that I came into the House this evening without really knowing what would be the exact subject of debate. I confess, looking to some of the remarks of my noble Friend, it was almost impossible to know what was to be the direction of the discussion; for the debate has gone much beyond the subject-matter before us, and no one could be prepared to meet off-hand all the questions that have been raised in the way they ought to be met. Therefore I hope to be excused by your Lordships if I show any shortcoming on this occasion. Your Lordships will understand that it arises not from any want of interest in the subject, or of respect to the noble Earl, but because I think the subject would be better discussed when the details of the Ministerial Bill are before us. As a matter of general remark, I venture to think that the intentions shadowed forth lie in the direction which the circumstances of the case demand, and which have been so much discussed by the country. The subjects which have been brought under your Lordships' notice are matters which fall more immediately within the responsibility of the Secretary of State than of myself. Military questions have been much less before your Lordships than other portions of the case. I therefore reserve to myself the opportunity of making what observations I think necessary on these subjects on some other occasion. But I have no hesitation in saying I think it is fortunate that we are endeavouring to amend the present constitution of our military forces rather than to introduce an entirely new system. The Government have endeavoured to extend the Reserves of the country—to increase the means of finding an Army for defence more than for offence—for offence is certainly not intended by the measures they have propounded—on the principles on which the Army has hitherto been founded, with the exception of limited service, which has been introduced to a large extent. Now, if limited service can be applied in the manner proposed, and if we can get good men under it, that, I believe, will be the simplest and easiest way of increasing the Reserves of the Army. It is a problem, however, that time alone will solve, and we must hope that the measures which have been commenced, though hitherto small in result, will expand our resources, and that it will be found practicable to have larger and more efficient Reserves. I quite accord with what fell from my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook), that the Army, having been weeded of inefficient men, is to that extent more efficient. With reference to the artillery, it has been supposed there was something like jugglery between the reduction of Indian artillery and the increase of artillery at home; as if the object really were to throw dust in the eyes of the public. But I hope the House will understand that, so far as we are concerned, there has been nothing of the sort—I am sure the noble Duke the Secretary of State for India will endorse what I say—it has long been in contemplation to make certain reductions in the artillery in India for financial considerations, and advantage was only taken of this opportunity of carrying that proposal into effect. It was also supposed that the batteries were not strong enough in men, and therefore it was intended to increase the number of men in the batteries in India, and to bring a certain number of skeleton batteries home. But the plan emanated with India itself; and, personally, I should have been glad if it had not been so, because we should have had a certain amount of promotion, which would have been gratifying to the artillery at home. But that was impossible, and I wish to put it clearly before the public, that this was an Indian and not a home question. My noble

Friend seems to be under the impression that the artillery is not so largely increased as he would wish; but I think it will be found to be largely increased, not only in the number of guns, but in the number of men. It is essential that a corps like the artillery should be as efficient as possible; and, as Artillerymen take longer time to make efficient than men in other branches, the intention is to increase the artillery more largely than any other branch of the service. In the same spirit it is intended to increase the cavalry, as they, too, require longer time to make efficient than the infantry, which can be more quickly brought up to the desired strength. At the same time, this is a matter that must be looked to with great care; and, although men may be sufficiently drilled to come into the ranks in four months, and may make remarkably good soldiers in a well-disciplined regiment with old soldiers by their side, yet I do not quite agree with my noble Friend that these men can be trained in the Militia and made efficient soldiers in three months. I happen to have seen a statement of General Moltke, in which he distinctly says that a man is not a first-rate soldier till he has served three years in the ranks. This was really the basis on which the Bill of last year proceeded, so that we have actually admitted the principle.

LORD NORTHBROOK explained. All he meant to say was, that three months might be sufficient for a Militia recruit to put him into the ranks of the Militia.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: I am delighted to have given my noble Friend the opportunity of making that explanation. But I go beyond the expression of my noble Friend; for the Bill of last year placed the minimum at three years. The Government has, therefore, adopted the just and proper period. However, these are details which we shall have a better opportunity of discussing when the Bill comes before us. I only wish the House should understand the reason why I do not now enter into the discussion at length. I have endeavoured, not in a political capacity—for in my position I have no politics—but in a military capacity to assist the Government in carrying out their measures. I only hope, whatever the result, it may be satisfactory. I have one other remark, my Lords, to make. It is a personal one. It has been frequently said of late that I am one of those who are not disposed to go with the spirit of the age, and to improve the condition of the Army in various ways. But I beg most distinctly to assure your Lordships—though the assurance, I should hope, was scarcely required—that, from the first day I entered on public life till the present hour, I have endeavoured to the utmost of my power to support every measure for advancing the comfort and efficiency of the British soldier. I am not aware of ever having resisted any measures of the kind, but, on the contrary, I have always endeavoured to promote all those measures which I believed to be most conducive to the best interests of the service, and calculated to place our Army, small as it is—too small, I believe, for the present circumstances of the age—in an efficient condition, as I firmly believe it is at present.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, the noble Lord who spoke second in the discussion (Lord Northbrook) told your Lordships that he was a young Member of this House; yet he ventured to give my noble Friend near me some advice. He said it was extremely inconvenient to make a Motion of this kind dealing with a variety of questions, which were at present under the consideration of the other House, and then the noble Lord himself proceeded to reply to a speech of mine made on the first night of the Session. If I am not mistaken, the noble Lord was in the House upon that occasion, and that, I submit, would have been the proper time to contradict anything which fell from me, if the noble Lord thought I had made any incorrect statement. I then stated that Lord Russell had written a letter in which that noble Lord stated that Mr. Cardwell's mission was retrenchment. I also said that at the General Election it was stated on the hustings that retrenchment was the watchword of the Government.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Would anyone, in addressing his constituents, dare to say that he was going to Parliament to support measures of retrenchment, but with regard to efficiency he did not care one farthing on the subject? Towards the end of his speech the noble Lord put words into the mouth of the illustrious Duke—

LORD NORTHBROOK: I am not aware that I put any words into the mouth of His Royal Highness. I merely said first, in alluding to certain improvement which the illustrious Duke had carried out, that in respect to those matters it would perhaps be better for me rather than the illustrious Duke to state what he had done. There was another case—

EARL GREY rose to Order. He said it was most irregular for the noble Lord to contradict another noble Lord in the course of his speech. If the noble Duke misrepresented anything, the noble Lord should wait until the termination of the noble Duke's speech, and then make whatever explanation he thought desirable.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I must apologize if I have misrepresented the noble Lord. The noble Lord having answered various statements made by me on the first day of the Session, went into the whole of the Government scheme with respect to the Army, replied to a great deal which my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Carnarvon) said and did not say, and apologized for his long statement by saying that he was also answering remarks made out-of-doors. Certainly, there was a great deal more irregularity in that course of proceeding than in anything which he found fault with in the conduct of my noble Friend. The subject of barracks was touched on by my noble Friend, and I can state that Christchurch Barracks were all but sold within the last 12 months for £1,500. They were, however, rescued from that fate, and they are now about to be occupied by a force in Her Majesty's service. I understood the noble Lord to say that some of the arsenals were in a complete state of fortification, and that some had been delayed in consequence of a change in the artillery, the guns being heavier than formerly. The effect of this course of proceeding is, that you will never be able to complete these forts until you arrive at an absolute state of perfection. I will not go into details as to whether the battery at Wimbledon was complete or not; but I will remind your Lordships that the statement was not that the battery was not complete, but that, to complete it, other batteries had to give up their horses. With respect to training, I ask, if you put a recruit of four months' training into the ranks, what sort of exhibition would he make? From my own experience in one of Her Majesty's cavalry regiments, I know that it takes more than a year to make a finished cavalry soldier. On this, as on other points, the noble Lord has been misinformed. This is a very large question. I quite agree that we cannot discuss the Government system as a whole, and it would be inconvenient to attempt to do so until we have it before us. Indeed, I should have been glad to have passed over anything connected with the Government scheme had it not been for some remarks made by the Under Secretary for War to which I cannot assent. I will only now allude shortly to one of many points—the abolition of purchase; and I feel bound to say that before abolishing this system the Government were bound to do three things—they must show, first, that the existing system is a bad one; secondly, that it has worked badly for the country; and, lastly, that the officers now in the British Army and their predecessors for a long series of years were not good officers, and did not properly lead their men in the various battles which are now matters of history. In the next place you have to show that the system you are about to substitute for it is a good system, and one which can be properly carried out. But above all—and I quite concur in the remark made on this point by the noble Lord opposite—the taxpayer must be considered, even in the House of Lords. You must show the taxpayer what he will have to pay if you abolish purchase, and come to the system of retirement—which purchase will render inevitable. So far as the country is concerned, the purchase system is the cheapest you can have, and you are bound to show what will be the expense of abolishing it. The noble Lord himself (Lord Northbrook) will be candid enough to admit that it is perfectly easy to show not only the expense of buying up all the interests which at present exist under the purchase system, but the expense of a scheme of retirement, and I think that information should be laid before the country. There is another subject on which I cannot forbear to remark, even in the presence of the illustrious Duke. The position of the illustrious Duke with regard to the Army of this country does not form part of the Government scheme, and, therefore, there is no irregularity in mentioning it. Those who have taken an interest in military affairs, as I have done for a very long time, must have been struck with the many speeches which were delivered, and the many statements which were made last year with regard to the position of the Commander-in-Chief. Scarcely a man in the country, except, perhaps, the Secretary of State, has, during the Parliamentary Recess, had more abuse lavished upon him than the illustrious Duke. Now, I believe it to be absolutely necessary to the interests of the Army that the officer Commanding-in-Chief should be a permanent officer. I can conceive nothing so bad for the Army as that its military chief should be selected by the Secretary of State, and should only serve for a term of five years. We all know what changes of government take place in this constitutional country. Now, if the Commander-in-Chief were appointed in this way, the Parliamentary pressure that would be put upon him would make it of the greatest possible difficulty for him to do his duty. Even a permanent officer in the position of His Royal Highness finds the duty of selection one of the greatest difficulty. Unless, then, the strictest and most positive rules are laid down for the selection of officers, an officer who is superseded will inevitably think he has a grievance. Your Lordships will recollect the case of an officer who was not thought fit for promotion, and who for the last ten years has been litigating with the authorities on the matter. You, therefore, want at the head of the Army one who is entirely above suspicion, one independent of all political influence, and who in these respects gives to the Army and the country the satisfaction which, if I may venture to say so in his presence, is given by his Royal Highness. In my opinion, it would be most unfortunate for the Army if we had any other system of administration than that which now prevails, and we hardly required the assurance of the illustrious Duke that he has always carried out the views of the Government of the day as far as he could do so. Ten years ago, in a debate upon the second reading of the Mutiny Act, His Royal Highness said that, as far as he was personally concerned, it should be his earnest and anxious endeavour to carry out the decision then come to in such a manner as to promote the best interests of the Army and of the country. I believe that His Royal Highness has acted most strictly and judiciously on the opinions he then uttered, and I think the country is extremely fortunate in having at the head of the Army one who is so thoroughly and practically acquainted with all the details of the regimental system, and the whole system of military discipline and promotion. Before concluding, I wish to ask the Under Secretary for War a question with regard to the position of Sir Henry Storks. What is the exact office he holds?

LORD NORTHBROOK: Surveyor General of the Ordnance.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Is that a permanent office? Or would he go out with the Ministry? I see that he has just been returned to represent the borough of Ripon in Parliament, and I think we have a right to know whether his is a permanent or a political office; whether in case of a change of government he would expect to go on as before.

EARL GREY: My Lords, no more vital question can occupy our attention than that of the sufficiency of the national defences; I think, therefore, we have reason to thank the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) who has brought this subject under our notice, and I own I was surprised that the Under Secretary should have found fault with the introduction of this subject at such a time as the present. He must remember that the Estimates never came before this House at all, and that the Government measure embodying the changes proposed in our military system will probably come before us at a very late period of the Session. If, therefore, we waited to discuss this matter until that Bill came before us, the Estimates would by that time have been voted, and we should practically be debarred from discussing at all, to any useful purpose, the important question of the military policy of the country. The course taken by the noble Earl is, in my opinion, perfectly regular and Parliamentary. I heard with pleasure a great portion of the speech of my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook). I was very glad to hear my noble Friend oppose early in his speech enter his protest against compulsory service, for I am persuaded that there could be no greater mistake than to attempt to force such a system upon this country. As he said, no one proposes to introduce it for the Army, but to adopt it for the Militia would be to adopt the system with all its hardships and none of its advantages. My noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon) has talked of the enormous expense of the English Army as compared with the Army of Prussia, and has contrasted the £7,000,000 which Prussia pays for her Army with the £15,000,000 annually expended on our own; but that comparison I believe to be most fallacious. It may be true that the Prussian Army costs to the State in money paid from the Treasury no more than £7,000,000 a year; but how much more does it cost in the indirect burden which it throws upon the people? The Prussian Army is so cheap, because you compel all ranks among the population to serve for very inadequate remuneration. We, on the contrary, are obliged to pay a fair market value for the services we require, because we do not resort to compulsion. We get no one to serve in our Army who does not receive what he himself considers a fair remuneration for the work which he performs. Again, in Prussia you not only get this service for comparatively nothing, but you expose the whole country to the enormous burden of having a very large proportion of the civil population withdrawn during some of the best years of their lives from the business which they are afterwards to follow, thus diminishing the productive power of the country; so that if the cost directly and indirectly of the Prussian Army were compared with our own, we should, I think, have no reason to be ashamed of the comparison. Now, my Lords, I think it would be a very mistaken policy to support in times of peace an Army upon the same scale as we should do in times of war. The expense of such an Army would be intolerable, while it would excite the just jealousy of other nations, and thus tend to perpetuate that system, which has unfortunately prevailed in Europe for some years, of keeping the military establishments of nations in a state of permanent preparation for war, which has had the effect not only of imposing upon them a large part of the burdens of war in times of peace, but also, as I believe, of making war itself more probable. But, at the same time, it seems to me absolutely necessary that we should have such arrangements for the defence of the country as will enable us to defend ourselves effectually in case of sudden danger; and your Lordships have to consider whether the arrangements now in progress are sufficient to afford us that real security which we ought to look for against sudden invasion. Looking at what has happened during the past year; looking at the suddenness with which war broke out, and the quickness with which enormous numbers of troops were put in motion; looking, too, at the merciless manner in which the conquered have been treated by those who have hitherto boasted of their superior civilization, but who, I think, must henceforth forfeit all claims to that distinction, this country is bound, in my opinion, not to trust for its exemption from the cruel exactions of foreign generals and soldiers to anything but its own power of repelling attack. Nor do I forget that, after all, our main reliance must be on our naval force. I do not underrate the enormous advantage we possess in having between ourselves and the military nations of Europe what has been called "the silver streak of sea." But we must not trust exclusively to this. Though extremely improbable, I can conceive it possible that by an unfortunate combination of circumstances an expedition, not upon a very large scale, might, in spite of all we could do, succeed in reaching our shores. And we should be in great danger if such an expedition could do us any great injury. If we were so strong at home that to send a small force against us would be to send it to certain destruction our situation would be different. To assemble a large Army and to make the necessary preparations for bringing it over would require much time, and the preparations which would have to be made could not well be concealed, and we should thus have time to make our preparations also. Nor is this all. To carry a large Army across the sea with its artillery and stores would require a multitude of vessels, which so loaded, it would be extremely difficult to keep together and to protect. Our unencumbered iron-clads and gunboats would have such facilities in attacking a naval expedition of that kind that it would be extremely difficult for it to effect a landing. Seeing, then, the almost insuperable difficulties standing in the way of any hostile expedition upon a really large scale effecting a landing on British territory, I, for one, should be satisfied with such a state of things as would enable the Government immediately after the breaking out of war to assemble a force sufficient to crush an expedition, not amounting to a large Army, as soon as it should land upon our shores. But, my Lords, is that the case? I find that on the 1st of August last year the whole of the Regular force within the United Kingdom was 84,000 men. I find it stated that, even with the increase now provided for, the Regular force within the United Kingdom is calculated during the present year at only 108,000. To that are to be added, of the First Army Reserve 9,000, and of the Second Army Reserve and Pensioners 30,000. Therefore, you have only 147,000 men, all told, connected with your Regular forces. But I cannot suppose that all your Pensioners are fit for service, or that the whole of both classes of the Reserve can be considered equivalent to troops of the Line; so that we must look at something very much under 150,000 as the total of our Regular Army that we could command in time of war. When you consider the force required to garrison Ireland and our one great arsenal, and to protect our dockyard, when you make the requisite deductions for sick, and when you add the consideration that you cannot be sure that an attack might not be made simultaneously at different parts of our coast, no man, I think, will say that our force is sufficient to leave us the assurance that an enemy landing on our coast, though only in moderate strength, would be certain to be driven into the sea. But then we are reminded that we have also the Volunteers and the Militia. The Volunteers and the Militia are, no doubt, a very useful force within certain limits; but it is quite idle to talk of their being really available for active operations in the field at the commencement of a war. The Militia, though a very costly force in proportion to the advantages we derive from it, has been brought to a state of comparative efficiency, reflects great credit on its officers, and would, no doubt, be capable of rendering in some ways very useful service. I cannot include it, however, among the available force which may be reckoned upon in case of emergency for active service in the field.

Earl Grey

There are, I know, some persons who say that the Militia is a very efficient force, and who consider it to be unduly disparaged when it is excluded in reckoning the amount of force we should have available for the field at the beginning of a war. At all events, it is contended it was found to be of the greatest possible advantage to this country in the last great war. I wish the following facts to be considered by those who regard the subject in this light. It is perfectly true that after the great Revolutionary war had been going on for some years, the Militia having been constantly embodied since the outbreak of the war, became a force not much inferior to the Line; but it was paid like the Line; it was managed like the Line; and in everything but name it constituted a portion of the Regular Army. At the beginning of the war, however, the Militia was nothing better than an armed rabble, and it required much labour and time to bring the force into the state of comparative efficiency which it subsequently attained. In the early part of that great war the officers intrusted with the defence of our coasts took little or no account of the Militia regiments under their orders in reckoning what force they could command. The advocates of the Militia say that in six months it would become a useful force; but we should not have six months to prepare—probably, not six weeks; possibly, not six days. Therefore I say the Militia is not to be reckoned on as an effective force for taking the field against an enemy who might succeed in landing on our shores at the beginning of a war. You have one method, and one only, of providing for your safety. In consequence of the expense and burden on the country you cannot constantly keep up a large Army in time of peace. On the other hand, you cannot trust to undisciplined or half-trained troops to meet disciplined troops. The advantages which thoroughly trained soldiers have always had over those who have not been so trained have been enormously increased by the improvements of late years in the weapons and the art of war, and it is now simple madness to pit partially-instructed troops against such soldiers as we should have to fight if we were again involved in war. It follows, therefore, that what you really want is a means, when a war breaks out, of adding to the Regular Army at almost a moment's notice, such a number of thoroughly trained men as will give it the force necessary for all operations. I was glad to hear my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State say that what we ought to look to was a powerful Reserve in connection with the Army; but I wish the Government had postponed the unwise reduction made last year until the Reserve had existed in something more than imagination. My noble Friend has defended with great ability, but not with equal success, the reduction of the Army last year. He says the Government dismissed 20,000 soldiers; but that some of them were bad characters and others nearly worn out, and that now we are getting a better class of men in their place. My noble Friend has quoted the authority of the Commander-in-Chief to show that reduced battalions of 500 good soldiers may be better than battalions of 600 in which there are 100 inefficient or bad ones. Yes, but not better, as the illustrious Duke has pointed out, than battalions of 600 good soldiers. I do not dispute the wisdom of discharging the bad soldiers; but surely their place ought to have been filled up at once. Again, my noble Friend says — "We have concentrated our force at home, and have as many men, or rather more, at home now than we had in former years." Surely, however, my noble Friend must perceive that, in considering what is our available force for defence at home, we must not merely consider the soldiers who are at this moment within the four seas, but those who, before this concentration was effected, might be recalled from some of the Colonies on a very short notice. I am of opinion that what my noble Friend calls concentration has been carried a great deal too far; and I may also remark that there were some great advantages in keeping a portion of our troops in the Colonies. They do not in some of the Colonies cost more than they do at home, and are even more favourably placed for health and discipline. The means now exist of bringing them very quickly home if they are wanted; it is therefore an obvious fallacy, in comparing the amount of troops you can command to meet an emergency, to count only those at the moment in the United Kingdom, excluding those available at short notice.

But, whether the policy of concentration has been carried too far or not, I do maintain that to reduce our standing force, either at home or abroad, before the creation of the contemplated Reserve, was a most imprudent measure. Though the actual breaking out of the war last year was very sudden, yet for three or four years at least threatening symptoms had been observable on the Continent; ever since 1866 France had been extremely discontented with the changes which had taken place in Germany, and Germany, on the other hand, resented the disposition shown by France to interfere with her. The occurrence of war on the Continent ought not to have come upon the Government as an entirely unexpected event, and it should have found us with a respectable force available. As the intended Reserve was still to be created, this force could only be furnished by the Regular Army, and it was therefore imprudent at such a time to reduce its numbers. This was also unwise for another reason. You cannot speedily create a reserve of trained soldiers unless you have a large regular Army from which men may take their discharge. My noble Friend says we may ultimately have 100,000 men for a Reserve. Well, I want to see that Reserve made; but, in order to bring about such a result, we ought temporarily to keep up the Regular Army in excess of what we mean to maintain it at permanently. In fact, it is only by taking that course that the Reserve can be formed. If the Army had not been reduced last year, and if, at the same time, Her Majesty's Government had encouraged soldiers to take their discharge at early periods, we might by this time have made considerable progress towards forming a Reserve. Her Majesty's Government had the means of doing this without passing the Act altering the terms of enlistment, and I continue to think that passing that Bill last Session was a mistake, for the reason I then stated—that frequent changes in the terms of enlistment confuse men's minds and are exceedingly mischievous in every respect; and I still think it would have been better if the Government, without altering the law in any way, had given notice that applications to leave the Army and join the Reserve would be favourably received. I therefore venture to say Her Majesty's Government have made a great mistake in not more largely increasing the Regular troops until they can form a more considerable Reserve. I am quite aware that the expense of that will be urged as an objection to the proposal. I shall be told that the Government have gone as far as they could in adding to the Army Estimates, and I will admit that these Estimates are unduly heavy; they are, in my opinion, heavier than they need have been, while the country might have been more effectually protected if our military administration had been more judiciously conducted than it has been for the last few years. Without adding a single farthing to the amount which the Government propose to demand, they might have made a considerable further addition to the Army. The measures for the improvement of the Militia are calculated to cost the country £400,000 in the ensuing financial year; if that money had been devoted to the increase of the Regular Army, according to the calculations of my noble Friend opposite, (Lord Northbrook) it would have given a further increase of 10,000 men. That would have been a very substantial increase of the Army, and an increase, too, of the means of feeding your Army Reserve; and I ask whether, in view of a sudden emergency, an addition of 10,000 men to the Regular Army would not have been more useful to the country than the proposed improvement of the Militia? This is not the time to discuss the proposals affecting the Militia; but I cannot help saying I am afraid my noble Friend has fallen into the great mistake of taking a middle line between two opposite policies, and incurring the inconveniences of both, without obtaining the advantages of either. I am afraid that, by the additions he is going to make to the Militia, he will increase its numbers more than is necessary for the peculiar service for which alone the Militia is intended; and he will further do this without making the Militia into soldiers, and he will discourage men from enlisting into the Militia. From what I have heard, I am inclined to think that requiring three or four months' drill of every Militiaman before he is to be considered a soldier will deprive you of some of the most useful classes who now enlist into the Militia. A Northumberland adjutant, an exceedingly able officer, wrote to me the other day, saying it was a great mistake to suppose that the same classes enlisted into the Army and into the Militia; in truth, he said, the two were recruited by quite different classes, and he stated that many of the artificers and men employed in the great works on the banks of the Tyne joined the Militia, though their pay in it is far lower than the wages they habitually earn, for the sake of enjoying a month's relaxation at reduced pay, and being of service to the country. We could not enlist a more valuable class into the Militia artillery, and it would be a great misfortune to discourage them entering it; but I believe that by prolonging the term of drill for recruits you will do so; and the addition to the time will be quite thrown away as far as regards making the men into anything like regular soldiers. My noble Friend said that three months' training ought not to be so very insufficient for Militiamen, when four months was sufficient to enable a man to take rank in the Guards; but the fallacy was admirably exposed by the Royal Duke who spoke afterwards, and who showed that, although four months' drill might enable a small percentage of men to take their places in a regular, well-drilled regiment without serious inconvenience, it would be totally different if the whole force were composed of men of that description. And when a Guardsman takes his place after four months' drill, his education does not stop, but it is continued for two or three years more; and I firmly believe that the illustrious Duke was right in saying that to make a really efficient soldier a training of at least three years is required. But the education of the Militiaman stops; and therefore it appears to me to be a great mistake to spend £400,000 a year upon the Militia when, by applying the money in another way, you could have your full money's worth in an increase of the Regular Army. I further believe the Government are making an injudicious appropriation of money in proposing the immediate abolition of the system of purchase. I remain of the opinion I have long held, that, in spite of objections to it, the purchase system has not worked badly. In abolishing that system, I believe you will find it a matter of extreme difficulty to establish any system of retirement which will make so rapid a current of promotion in your

Army as to make that Army efficient. Undoubtedly, hitherto, the Government have not solved the problem with regard to the seniority corps in our service, and I should have wished them to have solved that problem with respect to the Artillery and Engineers before they proceeded to abolish purchase in the rest of the Army. Even if all the benefits anticipated from the abolition of purchase should be realized, it is not a subject of pressing importance, for our regimental system has supplied us, on the whole, with an admirable body of regimental officers. The matter is not so pressing that you ought to apply to it so large a sum as £8,000,000, until you have attained other objects that are of more immediate importance. I will only mention one, which it is remarkable the noble Lord (Lord Northbrook) passed by in his very able answer to my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon). I do not remember any other important point in his speech which was not noticed by my noble Friend opposite; but this he did not touch upon, feeling, no doubt, that it was difficult to deal with. I refer to the importance of having some other arsenal besides Woolwich. Seeing how exposed it is to hostile attack, it is the height of imprudence to leave it our only great military and naval arsenal, and we ought to have another place where we can upon a large scale manufacture great guns and equipments for the Army. I think another arsenal like that at Woolwich is required, and that opinion was held, and admirable reasons were given for it, by the Commission which inquired into the matter several years ago. It would have been more judicious on the part of Government to have done something towards meeting that great need than to spend so much money in the abolition of the purchase system. But, unfortunately, popularity was to be gained by the one expense, and only the good of the country by the other, and in deciding upon their measure, popularity, and popularity alone, is the guide of our Government.

EARL DELAWARR thought it advisable that the Army should be divided into two portions; one to be enlisted for 12 years for service abroad, and the other for three years for service at home. At present a man who enlisted never knew what his destination would be, and this prevented many men from entering the service.

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for,

IRELAND—NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government intend to take any steps, during the present Session, to protect the masters of National Schools in Ireland against arbitrary removal by the patrons or managers of those establishments?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the National Schools were not the schools of the National Board, but of the managers; and from the very first the managers had had the power of dismissing teachers of whom they did not approve. It might be some satisfaction to the hon. Member if he informed him that a resolution was recently agreed to by the central committee of the Irish Teachers Association, to the effect that, in consequence of the opinion lately expressed in various quarters by persons eminently entitled to it respect and esteem, condemnatory of any agitation by the teachers of Ireland in regard to managerial rights, the executive committee of the central association earnestly and respectfully suggested to the provincial association to stay all further action on the question, and to work unitedly and determinedly for the redress of their grievances.

MR. RAIKES said, that on an early day he would call attention to the hardships now inflicted on the masters of National Schools in Ireland.

MR. MAGUIRE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If the Government intend to propose any plan for the improvement of the position of the National Teachers; and, if so, when he will be ready to explain it to the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the Government were quite aware of the necessity of making some improvement in the position of National School teachers in Ireland. Since his accession to his present Office, he had been in communication with the Commissioners of National Education on the subject, and as soon as he was fully in possession of their views the matter would be duly considered. The proper time, he conceived, for explaining the intentions of the Government to the House would be on the discussion of the Education Estimates; but, possibly, he might be in a position to make some general announcement on the subject at an earlier date.

ARMY—COMMISSIONS TO PAST CANDIDATES.—QUESTION.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he had given Notice of a Question to the Secretary of State for War in reference to the course it was proposed to take with reference to the appointment to commissions in the Army of those candidates who passed their examination in the autumn of last year. As that Question was substantially answered by the reply to the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) last Monday, the Secretary of State had allowed him to ask him a Question on that answer. He said that candidates who passed their examination last autumn would be admitted to commissions "subject to conditions for insuring competency." He wished to ask whether it was intended that they should undergo another examination?

MR. CARDWELL: No. These commissions will be issued without purchase; and I meant to say that, in consideration of that great advantage, certain conditions would be laid down for insuring the efficiency of officers during their progress in the service.

RUSSIA—THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA AND GENERAL FLEURY.—QUESTION.

MR. W. C. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Why the Despatch of Sir Andrew Buchanan of the 9th day of September, reporting a Communication by the Emperor of Russia to General Fleury, and which Despatch is referred to at page 84, Despatch No. 137, of the Correspondence respecting the Franco-German War, is not given in the volume?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, I am not surprised that my hon. Friend should have called the attention of the House to the omission in question, and Lord Granville regrets that, through an oversight, he should have referred in a public despatch to one of a confidential character; that despatch referred to a conversation between the Emperor of Russia and the French Ambassador, to which Sir Andrew Buchanan was not a party, but the substance of it was confidentially made known to him and reported in the same confidence to Her Majesty's Government. For this reason it would be impossible to publish the Paper in question, as the doing so would involve a breach of confidence.

ADULTERATION OF WINES.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to a statement in the public Press that a recent test of cherry wines, described to be of superior quality, has shown that they were adulterated with an acid highly injurious to health; whether it be true that the adulteration took place in the Docks with the knowledge of the officers of Customs; and, whether the officers of Customs have received instructions to afford every facility for the adulteration of wines in bond provided the owners declare such adulteration to be for the purpose of fortifying the wines?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In answer, Sir, to the hon. Baronet I have to state, first, my attention has not been drawn to this subject otherwise than by the Question he has been good enough to address to me. In the second place, I have to state that I have made inquiry, and am informed that no adulteration has been carried on with the cognizance or permission of the officers of Customs; and, in the third place, that we do not give orders to the officers of Customs to tolerate any adulteration whatever, but their orders are of this nature—that they are to permit persons having wines in bond to fortify those wines—[“Hear, hear!”]—which, as hon. Gentlemen are aware, is absolutely necessary for their preservation. And we also permit them in case of the wines becoming cloudy to use some means for refining them. But the officers are strictly forbidden from allowing any adulteration.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE: I give Notice, then, that I shall move for a Return of the quantity of Hamburg and other spirits used in the Docks for fortifying wines.

PUBLIC SCHOOL STATUTES.

QUESTION.

MR. STONE asked Mr. Solicitor General, Whether the Queen in Council has refused her assent to the Statutes framed by the Public Schools Commissioners for constituting the new governing bodies of certain Public Schools; and, if so, on what grounds; whether, in preparing new Statutes, the Commissioners will reconsider the question of requiring the Governors of Harrow and Winchester to be members of the Church of England; how long he thinks it will be before the new governing bodies will all be constituted; and, whether he intends to ask Parliament further to extend the time allowed to the new governing bodies for making Statutes, which time, by the Act now in force, will expire on the 31st July?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, in reply, that it was quite true that by an Order in Council dated the 8th instant Her Majesty had signified her disapproval of the statutes made by the Commissioners in February and March, 1870. Her Majesty did not, however, disallow the statutes last sent to the Privy Council, because it turned out that by the operation of the Act the sending back of the first set of statutes to the Commissioners for re-consideration, upon the recommendation of that House, was an excess of power on the part of the Crown, which could only allow or disallow them. The second set of statutes of the Commissioners were, therefore, made without authority. The matter would now be forwarded with all possible despatch. It might be that, in consequence of the delay which had occurred through that misapprehension on the part both of the Commissioners and of those who wished for the alteration of the statutes, the time would be too short for the Governing Bodies of the schools to make the necessary arrangements. If so, it would be only fair and right that those Governing Bodies should have a reasonable time allowed them for taking the initiative, just as if no such mistake as he had described had occurred.

ARMY—CENTRAL ARSENAL—UNIFORM OF VOLUNTEERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON - DAMER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has taken into consideration the urgency of forming a second Arsenal in a central position in England, such as Can-nock Chase, abounding in coal; and, whether all Volunteers, with the exception of the Artillery corps should be clothed in scarlet?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the subject of the formation of a second central arsenal had long been under the consideration of the Government, but that no proposal for the creation of such an establishment had yet been adopted, and, therefore, no sums on account of it appeared in the Estimates for the present year. With regard to the clothing of the Volunteers, as he had stated the other evening, that while he thought it desirable there should be uniformity in their dress, it was a matter which was left to be regulated by the Volunteers themselves.

SCOTLAND—TRAINING SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Why, in the New Code of Regulations laid upon the Table of the House, and based on the consideration of the various sections of "The Elementary Education Act, 1870," an alteration has been made in the syllabus of study in Training Schools in Scotland; and, whether he has considered the inconvenience that may arise inasmuch as that Act does not apply to Scotland, and the arrangements for teaching in such schools for the current year have been made according to the regulations now in force, and are already in course of being carried out?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply to the first part of the Question of his hon. Friend, that the alteration which had been made was not in the Code, but in the syllabus of training schools, and this had been laid on the Table. The Elementary Education Act of last year had no direct relation to training schools; but it became necessary for the Government to consider the position in which they were placed in regard to those schools, and especially they had to consider the question of religious instruction that might be given therein. Hitherto religious instruction in the training schools in Great Britain had been inspected by the Inspectors appointed and paid by the Government. The opinion of Parliament had, in the view of the Government, been clearly declared during the passing of the Education Act last year to be that while on the one hand opportunity should be given for religious instruction, on the other hand there should be no payments out of the taxes towards religious instruction in schools, and although there was no mention made of training schools in the Act, the Government felt it was their duty to carry out these principles in the mode of distributing the grants for training schools. Consequently, towards the end of the year information was sent to the training schools throughout England that, in future, there would be no attempt on the part of the Government to inspect religious instruction or to pay for that instruction in the future. They had then to consider how Scotland should be dealt with. Bearing in mind that up to the present time there had been no difference of opinion in Scotland with regard to the religious question, the Government had to choose between two courses—either to treat different parts of Great Britain differently, and ask Parliament for a grant for the inspection of religious instruction in Scotland while refusing it in England, or to apply to Scotland the same principle as that adopted for England, and strike religious instruction out of the syllabus. Although the Government were sorry to appear to anticipate legislation with regard to Scotland, yet they felt it would be anticipating legislation if they decided to make a difference; and they had in their best discretion come to the conclusion to strike religious instruction out of the Scotch syllabus. With reference to the second part of his hon. Friend's Question, the arrangements in England for religious teaching had been made under the sanction and instigation of the Bishops, by which the religious instruction would be conducted and inspected by gentlemen appointed by the promoters of the training schools, as well as by the clergy themselves: and probably the same course would be taken in Scotland. In conclusion, he might state that this step had been taken, not with any intention of applying an English Act to Scotland, but in consequence of the clear opinion of the Imperial Parliament on the general question, as expressed in the Elementary Education Act of last year.

CHINA AND JAPAN CONSULAR REPORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the remaining portion of the China and Japan Consular Reports for the year 1869 will be issued; and if arrangements can be made for their earlier publication; and, when the Consular Reports from Saigon, Batavia, Sarawak, Bangkok, and Manilla will be issued?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The only China Returns for 1869 which have not yet been published are those from Shanghai and Taiwan, which were received after the close of the Session, in September and December. They are now in the printer's hands. (See "China," No. 12, 1870.) All the Japan Reports and Returns have been published. (See "Japan," No 4, 1870.) The Returns and Report from Bangkok—our only station in Siam—were also presented to Parliament last Session. (See "China," No. 7, 1870.) The reason of the delay in publishing some Reports is that it has been the custom to lay them before Parliament first, and to keep over those which arrive too late to be presented till the next Session. No Consular Reports for the last two years have been received either from Saigon or Batavia; the former is an unpaid post, and at the latter there is a trading Consul, and their communications with the Home Government are not quite so punctual as would be expected from salaried officers. The last Commercial Report from Sarawak was printed in September, 1869, and from Manilla in April, 1870. There has been hardly time to receive last year's Report from the Manilla Consulate.

IRELAND—MAGISTRACY OF DROGHEDA. QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that the presentments to the commission of the peace in Ireland were attracting considerable interest at the present time, and therefore he wished to draw the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to a paragraph in an Irish newspaper stating that a person holding the position of a retail publican had been appointed to the magistracy of Drogheda. He begged to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in a Dublin newspaper, that Mr. Robert Bedford Daly, auctioneer and publican, has been appointed to the commission of the peace for the borough of Drogheda, and on whose recommendation; and, whether the rule so long in force preventing the appointment to the magistracy of dealers in spirits and beer is now set aside, and on what grounds, and by whose authority?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that as he happened to be responsible for the advice given to the Lord Lieutenant to appoint this gentleman on the commission of the peace, he begged to be permitted to answer the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He gave that advice upon his own knowledge of Mr. Daly, and of his high respectability, "fortified" by high authority. He had no reason to believe that Mr. Daly was a publican when he gave that advice, neither had he reason to believe it now. He had since ascertained that Mr. Daly, who had been for two years Mayor of Drogheda, was a member of a large grocery establishment, but which also held a wine licence. Mr. Daly was in no sense a publican more than Mr. Findlater, of Dublin, might be so described. And, indeed, Mr. Daly could not be said to hold a licence even in that sense at the present time, inasmuch as he had some time since transferred it to another member of his family. He had been further informed that this gentleman who, as he had stated, was in no sense a publican, was offered the commission of the peace for Drogheda by the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Louth three years ago, and he was not placed upon it on the sole ground that it was considered that the number of the magistrates was excessive, which was not the case at present. He might also inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman that this respectable gentleman had been honoured by the confidence of his fellow-citizens by being elected to fill a number of local offices; and although, being a member of the Established Church, he had taken the course of supporting the disestablishment of that Church, he had been elected a member of the select vestry for Drogheda under the new system. He understood that the newspaper paragraph which had filled the mind of his hon. and gallant Friend with consternation had been withdrawn, and had been followed by a highly complimentary article in the same journal.

NAVY—DEPTFORD DOCKYARD. QUESTION.

MR. CUBITT asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the sale of the Government Dockyard to Mr. Austen has been completed; and, if so, whether he is aware if Mr. Austen still remains the owner of it; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have sanctioned the scheme of establishing a foreign cattle market on the site of the dockyard?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, Mr. Austen's interest in that portion of Deptford Dockyard sold to him has been transferred to the Corporation of the City of London, in whose favour the title-deed is being prepared. The Admiralty has nothing to do with the proposal to establish a cattle market on the site; but I believe that such a scheme has been sanctioned by the proper authority.

IRELAND—IRISH CONSTABULARY AND THE GUN LICENCES ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. PEEL DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Irish Constabulary Force so particularly referred to in the wording of the enactment will be employed in carrying out the provisions of the Gun Licences Act, passed in the last Session of Parliament; and, whether he is aware that there is a strong opinion among the local magistracy in several districts of Ireland that without the co-operation of the police force the Act will remain ineffectual and useless both for the purposes of Revenue and of social protection?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the provisions of the Gun Licences Act, as regarded the constabulary, were permissive and not obligatory. The action of the constabulary under that Act was confined to the power of arrest of a person using or carrying a gun without a licence who further refused to give his name and address. In the event of the person giving his name and address the constable could only give information of the fact to the Excise officer. There were serious objections to impose upon the constabulary fresh duties not immediately connected with the preservation of the public peace or the detection of crime, and still more to impose upon them duties calculated to cause them to be regarded as common informers in the estimation of the public. He was aware that in certain rural districts the local magistrates had requested the co-operation of the constabulary in enforcing the provisions of the Act.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL TRANSIT RATES. QUESTION.

MR. MAGNIAC asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will endeavour to procure from the Foreign Governments through whose territory the Mails for the East viâ Brindisi have to pass a reduction in the present heavy postal charges?

MR. MONSELL said, the transit rates referred to by the hon. Member were payable to the Governments of Belgium,

Mr. Baxter

North Germany, and Italy. Those payable to the North German Post Office were fixed by a Convention concluded as recently as last April, and those payable to the Italian Government were settled only the other day. None of the rates charged were considered excessive, and as they had been so recently fixed, he feared nothing would be gained by asking for a reduction at present.

WORKING OF THE EDUCATION ACT. QUESTION.

MR. DIMSDALE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, When those managers of schools who have memorialized the Committee of Council for assistance towards the cost of erecting school buildings, may expect to receive an answer to the application made by such managers?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I fear, Sir, that the only answer I can give is that all the applications will be taken in turn. There are two classes of applications—those for the enlargement of schools, and those for the building of new schools, and each class will be taken in turn, according to the date of the application. The Office is doing its very utmost to proceed with the utmost possible despatch; but it is impossible for us to state distinctly when they will all be disposed of. There is an enormous number of applications to be dealt with. In the year before last 236 of these applications were disposed of; last year we had 3,300 applications, of which 3,003 came in the last five months, and by far the largest proportion came within the last month, many even on the very last day or two of the year. As regards the general working of the Education Act, I may remark that an extraordinary amount of labour has been imposed on the Department. More than 14,000 school returns have been received since the passing of that Act, and though no head of a Department could be supported with greater ability and diligence by its officers than Lord De Grey and myself have been, yet even with a new and the old staff working for a greater number of hours than it is right for them to work, we find it difficult to keep pace with the activity of the country—an activity in which we greatly rejoice, though it has imposed upon us a large amount of extra labour.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION.

MR. MELLY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any intention of bringing in a Bill to extend the jurisdiction of Stipendiary Magistrates in districts where the increase of population demands such extension, and to charge the salaries and cost of Stipendiary Magistrates in the provinces, after deduction of fees and fines, upon the Consolidated Fund, as in the case of the London Police Courts, thus relieving the provincial ratepayer from burdens not borne by the ratepayers of the metropolis?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he was aware of the great difficulty and expense the constituents of the hon. Member had encountered in endeavouring to extend the area of the stipendiary magistrates' jurisdiction, and in consequence he had paid special attention to the subject. He thought it would be possible to bring in a Bill enabling boundaries to be extended without exposing ratepayers to the expense now imposed upon them. He would, if time permitted, introduce such a Bill; but he could not promise to include in it a proposal to charge the expense of stipendiary magistrates in the country upon the Consolidated Fund.

IRELAND—DISTRIBUTION OF DUPLICATE WORKS—BRITISH MUSEUM AND THE ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY.

QUESTION.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, this Session, to enable the Trustees of the British Museum to give or lend duplicate specimens to the Royal Dublin Society and other similar institutions?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, the attention of the Government had not been specially called to this matter; but he should consider it to be his duty to make a communication to the Trustees of the British Museum, and ascertain what could be done in the direction pointed out in the Question of the hon. Baronet.

METROPOLIS—THE ALBERT MEMORIAL AND THE KENSINGTON ROAD.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is in contemplation to take any and what portion of Hyde Park on the south front of the Albert Memorial for improving the Kensington Road at that part; and, for what purpose the work in Hyde Park on the south front of the Albert Memorial is now being carried on?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, what was intended to be done was to make the short flight of steps in front of the Albert Memorial, in order to carry out so much of the design as was absolutely necessary to complete the arrangements for the Memorial on the original plan. With regard to improving the road an arrangement was come to with the District Board of Works of Westminster to prosecute a Bill for improving the road, and the Great Exhibition Commissioners, having in view the opening of the Exhibition this year, agreed to provide for the expense; but, subsequently, the district board wished to withdraw from the arrangement, and the Bill was not further prosecuted. As the Exchequer did not undertake the paving of metropolitan roads, it did not seem clear how anything could at present be done in the way of improvement unless some such arrangement as the one to which he had referred could be again arrived at and carried into effect. But if nothing was done either by the local or the Metropolitan Board within a reasonable time, the consideration of the subject could be resumed at a future period.

ARTILLERY—RIFLED GUNS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had a Question to ask the Secretary of State for War, but he had been informed that it would be more convenient to ask the information he required at the hands of the Surveyor General of Ordnance. He would therefore ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for Ripon, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return continuing and completing the information contained in the Return (Rifled Guns), No. 415, August 1869, up to the 1st of January 1871?

SIR HENRY STORKS replied, that the Return referred to in the Question should be laid upon the Table.

POWER TO EXAMINE WITNESSES ON OATH.—QUESTION.

MR. W. M. TORRENS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this Session to carry into effect the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1869, that provision should be made by Act of Parliament for conferring on the House of Commons the power of examining witnesses on oath?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Government to introduce, in the course of the present Session, a Bill founded upon the Report of the Committee referred to by the hon. Member.

IRELAND—THE VOLUNTEER SYSTEM.
QUESTION.

MR. BAGWELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to extend the Volunteer system to Ireland; and, if not, why not?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, my hon. Friend will probably remember, or if he does not remember, he will find by reference to the Parliamentary Debates, that, in the year 1863, the Government of Lord Palmerston declined to extend the Volunteer system to Ireland, not, as was explained by Lord Palmerston, because there was any reason to doubt the loyalty of the great majority of the Irish people, but on account of the unfortunate existence of strong religious dissensions in that country. There was a great danger that the Volunteers might assume a sectarian character, and that the formation of Volunteer corps might be productive of collisions and breaches of the public peace. I hope that those circumstances may not constitute a permanent obstacle to the raising of a Volunteer Force in Ireland; but I am unable to say that the times are so completely altered that those obstacles are already removed.

SALMON FISHERY.—QUESTION.

MR. DODDS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend, during the present Session, to bring in a Bill to give effect to the Recommendations of the Select Committee of 1869-70 on Salmon Fisheries?

Sir John Hay

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I am afraid my other engagements will render it impossible for me to bring in a Bill on this subject in the present year.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government intend to take any steps, during the present Session, to carry out the whole of the recommendations of the unanimous Report of the Royal Commission of 1866 on Capital Punishment; and, also if the Government contemplate dealing with the latter portion of that Report not included in their recommendation, and which involves the very important questions of—1. An appeal on matters of fact to a Court of Law in criminal cases; 2. The mode in which the Crown is advised to exercise the prerogative of mercy by the Home Secretary; and 3. The present state of the Law as to the nature and degree of insanity which is held to relieve the accused from penal responsibility in criminal cases?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I fully admit the importance of the subject to which the attention of the House has been directed by the hon. Baronet; but, at the same time, I must say—as I have just said with regard to the Salmon Fisheries—that the time of the Government will not permit them to legislate on a question of so much importance and intricacy in the present Parliament.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON: I beg to give Notice that I will myself introduce a Bill on the subject after Easter.

EXPENSES OF THE POLICE.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is not the case that the special and extraordinary expenses of the Police employed at the International Exhibition held in London in 1862, amounting to £21,521, was charged to the Country and not debited to the account of that undertaking; and, whether the special and extraordinary expenses of the Police to be incurred at the opening of, and during the forthcoming exhibition at, the Kensington Central Music Hall, will be at the charge of the Country or debited to the account of that speculation?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that it was not the case that the country was charged one single penny of the expenses of the police employed at the International Exhibition of 1862. The sum of £21,521 was the estimate taken for the special and extraordinary services of police at the Exhibition of 1862; but the sum actually spent was £19,435, of which five-sixths were paid by the Commissioners out of the proceeds of the Exhibition, and the remaining sixth was regarded as properly falling upon the resources of the Police Fund. In fact, the whole of the internal expenses of watching and keeping order in the building and two-thirds of the expenses of keeping order in the roads and approaches were paid by the Commissioners. With regard to the Exhibition of the present year, a similar arrangement had been made so far as the interior of the building was concerned; but no arrangement had yet been made with reference to the roads and approaches.

GREECE — CASE OF MR. FRANK NOEL. QUESTION.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the charge against Mr. Frank Noel has been entirely dismissed; whether, seeing that Mr. Frank Noel's generous conduct in the affair of the Massacre at Marathon had been fully approved, Mr. Erskine was instructed to protest against it; and, whether the Papers will be laid upon the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, that Mr. Erskine telegraphed on the 18th instant that he had been informed on good authority that the Court of Appeal had ordered the provisional cessation of all further proceedings against Mr. Noel, and that a warrant for his discharge was issued that evening. It would, he thought, be seen from the Papers just published that all steps that could be properly adopted to insure Mr. Noel receiving protection and support were from the first taken by Mr. Erskine, either without or under instructions from home. He (Viscount Enfield) believed that the Papers relating to this subject were circulated that morning.

BALLOT BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. GEORGE BENTINCK, MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had fully hoped that the Ballot Bill would have been delivered to hon. Members on Wednesday morning. A few copies only were delivered on Wednesday afternoon; but the Bill was not delivered to hon. Members generally till that (Thursday) morning. Under these circumstances, he would not propose the second reading of the Bill on Monday.

IRELAND—STATE OF WESTMEATH. NOTICE.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I beg to give Notice that on Monday next I shall move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of Westmeath and certain parts adjoining Meath and King's County, the nature, extent, and effect of certain unlawful combinations and confederacies existing therein, and the best means of suppressing the same. I also beg to give Notice that on the nomination of the Committee I shall move that it be a Secret Committee.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION BILL. QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL expressed a hope that the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, and the Estimate for the compensation of Officers on the abolition of the purchase system, would be placed in the hands of Members before the second reading of the Army Re-organization Bill was taken.

MR. CARDWELL replied that the Papers in question had been formally laid on the Table, and would soon be in the hands of hon. Members.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL. QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. GORDON, MR. BRUCE said, the Scotch Education Bill had been delivered to hon. Members, and he understood it was the general desire of the Scotch Members that the second reading should be proceeded with on Monday next, as originally fixed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Notice of Motion relative to East India Finance.—
(Mr. Gladstone.)

EAST INDIA FINANCE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed "to inquire into the Finance and Financial Administration of India," said: As I have already stated, I will not enter upon the subject of the appointment of this Committee, on which I consider the House to be agreed; but I will state to the House what I conceive to be the exact bearings of the issue with regard to the propositions which the Government intend to make, and which would be carried into effect by steps subsequent to the adoption of this Committee by a joint Committee of the two Houses. The House, I hope, will clearly understand that that is a proposition which the Committee will deal with upon its merits entirely, without reference to any supposed engagement which would in any manner affect their liberty of action. Neither the House of Commons nor the House of Lords has taken any step or has in any manner considered the question whether it is expedient that the inquiry should be conducted by a joint Committee, or whether it should be conducted by a Committee of each House separately, or by this House alone, acting on its own responsibility, if the other House should not think fit to follow our example. I do not wish to magnify the question. It is one within a limited scope; and it will only require two or three minutes for me to state the ground of view which the Government take, and the reasons which have induced them to lay the proposal before the House. In the first place, I think the principle of the co-operation of the two Houses in the matters of inquiry conducted before Committees, or even in matters of legislation, at the stage in which measures go before Committees is a very great principle. In the mass of legislation that comes before the Legislature of this country, it is a very great object to discover the means of economizing time, and I think it is the duty of the Government, where there are any means of economizing the public time with reference to matters proper for inquiry by Committees of the two Houses, to take advantage of those means. The question is whether the present occasion is a suitable occasion for that purpose, because I do not suppose it will be thought by anyone that there is any anomaly or novelty per se in conducting an inquiry jointly by Members of this House and by Members of the House of Lords. The first reason for proposing a joint Committee on this subject is that the House of Lords happens to be what may be called particularly strong on the matter of East Indian experience. I need not refer to the names of the noble Lords, some of whom have been in the face of this country; but there is one in particular who has a most distinguished name in connection with Indian administration. No one, I think, would doubt that he would contribute greatly to the efficiency of an inquiry of this kind, and I need hardly say would promote the object we have in view. Another reason is this—that by a Committee of this kind it is always desirable that what may be called the official element of Parliament should be represented up to a certain point—should be represented in considerable strength, though not in such strength as in any way to interfere with the preponderance of independent opinion on the Committee. But in inquiries of this kind, where any administrative Department is concerned, I think we generally see a fourth, and sometimes as many as a third, not of Members in Office, but of Members who are in Office or have been some time in Office in connection with the particular subject; and the advantage of that is that they can render very considerable assistance to those who prosecute the inquiry from a certain point of view. It so happens that the official element, so to speak, with reference to this particular subject is numerically weak in the present House of Commons. Indeed, the judgment of the Government has been influenced to a considerable extent by a circumstance affecting a particular Member of this House. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), sitting on the other side of the House, having held, at an anxious period, the Office of Secretary of State for India, has, with very great public spirit—and I am very glad to have an opportunity of bearing testimony in my place here to the fact, as I have done before in private — that right hon. Baronet, I say, who would have been a proper and becoming, and, I may add, essential representative of this House in an inquiry of this kind, has given his services in the important Commission sent to the United States, and thereby weakened what I may call the official element in the ranks of the Committee. No doubt it is in the power of the House to appoint the Under Secretary of State for India, and I hope he will be a Member of the Committee; but I do not think it would be entirely satisfactory that the great party which, with those sitting on this side, makes up the House should remain unrepresented in the official class. It appears to me that this is a very good reason, independent of any other, why we should resort to the plan of a joint Committee. Supposing we go forward, as I now propose, there is, I believe, but one Gentleman — namely, my hon. Friend near me (Mr. Grant Duff), who discharges his duty with so much ability — whom we could appoint as having official experience. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) did hold Office in connection with India, but it was a long time ago; and, besides, his occupation as a Cabinet Minister, and being Chancellor of the Exchequer, would make it impossible for him to give due attention to the inquiry. In the same manner my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade, who was, I believe, Under Secretary for a very short time, is in the same predicament, and it would be quite impossible for him to give attention to Indian matters. Now, it may be that there is some jealousy among the independent Members of this House, lest what I may call the officialism of the other House should be too strong. But it will be in their own power to provide against that danger. It appears to me that this Committee, being chosen from the two Houses, should be larger than usual — that it should consist of 11 Members from each House; and if there be but one person connected with Office from the House of Commons, the independent element will start with 10 Gentlemen taken from the two sides of the House. If, then, the particular position of the House of Lords should make it desirable that three, four, or even five of its Members who have served in India should be appointed, it will be seen that independent Commoners would form three-fourths, or about three-fourths of the Committee. There is only one other point of importance which touches the question of a joint Committee. It is, I believe, a matter of usage and custom that, in the case of a joint Committee, the Chairman should be a Peer; but that Chairman would be chosen by the free choice of the joint Committee itself. First of all, I believe that the technical rules of the House of Lords have been very much relaxed, of late years, with regard to the choice of the Chairmen of Committees; but it is obvious that the application of those technical rules would never be enforced, in the case of a joint Committee. So far as the Chair is concerned, it would be the choice of the Committee that would determine the matter. I may add, that the only object of the Government is to bring to the consideration of this important subject the most efficient and strongest Committee that we can get. We are of opinion that object will be best attained by a joint Committee of the two Houses. We commend that proposition to the general approval of the House; but, at the same time, it must depend upon that general approval being obtained, because it would be an ill beginning for the Committee if there should be any great and serious difference of opinion at the outset respecting its constitution. I will conclude by proposing the Motion that stands in my name, and it is not necessary at present to move the question of the joint Committee.

COLONEL SYKES was of opinion that the Government was doing a great injustice to itself in limiting the scope of the inquiry to the points, how money had been collected in India and how it had been spent. There was a vast number of other subjects which required to be investigated, and to be placed before the public for its judgment. In 1833 that House appointed a Committee of its own Members to take into consideration not only the financial condition of India, but its administration by the East India Company, and the East India Company, so far from objecting, invited the strictest scrutiny into their administration and accounts. They had then a monopoly of trade with India. The result of the inquiry was, that so thoroughly satisfied was the Committee with the administration of the affairs of India by the Company, that a new term of 20 years was granted to them. In 1852 another Committee was appointed. There was at the time a strong feeling growing up in this country against the administration of the Company, though it had been uniformly successful and had transferred to England an Empire larger than ever existed before. So well satisfied was the Committee with the management of the trust reposed in the East India Company that they recommended the Company should be granted a further term of 20 years from 1852, and nothing but the unhappy mutiny in Bengal, which arose not from any action of the Company, but from the invasion of caste prejudices in the Bengal Army, had prevented the administration of India from being still in the hands of the Company. He was a witness before both of the Committees, and he knew that many important facts had been elicited which would never have been known if their labours had been confined within the narrow range now proposed. He thought he would be able to show when the Under Secretary of State for India should make his annual statement that the administration of the affairs of India would with greater advantage to the people of India, have been in the hands of the Company than of the Crown. He would tell his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government that if the inquiry were limited to the question of money it would not give satisfaction to the Europeans in India, and most decidedly not to the Native population.

MR. C. B. DENISON said, he regretted to find himself in antagonism with the Prime Minister on this subject of a Joint Committee of both Houses; but it would be admitted that, when an unusual and unprecedented course was advocated by the Leader of the House, he was bound to give some special extraordinary and cogent reasons for the proposal. He took exception to the course proposed for several reasons. In the first place, it was unnecessary. Secondly, it involved an aspersion on the intelligence, competence, and discretion of that House. Thirdly, the inquiry into the finance and financial administration of India involved indirectly, if not directly, questions of finance which concerned the taxpayers of this country. And lastly, the composition of the Committee—half of Peers, half of Members of that House—would, of necessity, involve a larger proportion of the official element than was desirable in such an inquiry. He might observe, in passing, that he entirely disagreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Sykes) in wishing that the scope of the inquiry should be enlarged. It would be utterly impossible, in the course of one Session, to extend the scope of the inquiry with any practical result. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had given as the first reason for departing from the usual course, that the House of Commons was particularly deficient in Members possessing official knowledge of Indian subjects. Now, he had taken the trouble to refer back to the previous Committees of that House upon Indian affairs. He held in his hand the nominal roll of the Committee appointed in 1852, and he found it was composed of 31 Members drawn from all sides of the House, from men of all shades of opinion and all degrees of experience, and of the whole 31 there were not more than four or five who had any local or official knowledge of India. Indeed, if the argument of the right hon. Gentleman was worth anything, it would go a great deal farther than he seemed to think. Who were the men who had been most frequently appointed Secretaries of State for India or Governors General? Were they men who had any personal knowledge of India? Had Lord Dalhousie, Lord Canning, or Lord Mayo, or most of those who had been most distinguished on the roll of Governors General? To come nearer home, had the four or five men in the House of Lords who had filled the Office of Secretary of State for India, or President of the Board of Control, any personal knowledge of India? Well, then, of what force was the argument that official knowledge was required? He did not hesitate to say that it would be most undesirable to have on this joint Committee four ex-Secretaries and one ex-Governor General, if not sitting in judgment, at least inquiring into official acts with which they had been more or less connected. Since the Government of India had changed hands the interest of the Debt had more than doubled; we had year by year a chaotic mass of accounts both in that country and this, and he, and those who held similar views, wished to know the causes which had led to increased taxation year by year, while the revenues of India were at the same time increasing. He wished, he might add, that the right hon. Gentleman had furnished the House with some precedent for the course which he asked it to adopt, for he had failed to find any case analogous to the present. It was quite true that within the last few years Joint Committees of both Houses had been appointed; but they had been appointed with the object of deciding what would be a suitable mode of proceeding in certain technical matters. As to the Joint Committee which had been nominated in the reign of William III., it was one which had been appointed under a special Act of Parliament, to make a judicial inquiry into the corrupt distribution of large sums of money by the then Chairman of the East India Company, alleged to have been paid to Members of both Houses to obtain a renewal of the Company's charter, and the inquiry ended in the impeachment of a noble Duke (the Duke of Leeds). When, therefore, on a future occasion, a discussion was held on the composition of the proposed Committee, he hoped some hon. Members of greater experience than himself would give their opinions as to whether it was expedient to change the long-established and recognized course of inquiry without due deliberation, and, as it were, by a side-wind. For, he could not admit that the fortuitous absence of any individual Member of the House, however able or experienced, and he did not deny that the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon was both able and experienced, was a sufficiently cogent reason for suddenly changing the constitution of the proposed Committee. He must further observe that the financial affairs of India were intimately allied with taxation, and were of great interest as bearing upon the taxpayers of this country. Of the £200,000,000 of public debt in India, including the railway debt, less than 10 per cent was held by the natives of India, the whole of the rest being held by our fellow-countrymen. What was the security for it? A first charge on the revenues of India, which was worth only as much as the continuance of English dominion; and he should like to know whether the high-handed way in which taxation had been imposed on the natives was conducive or not to the prolongation of that dominion? Another objection he had to the Committee was, that it would be composed to too great an extent of official Members of the other House of Parliament. He was aware that those official Members were very distinguished men, who had held the office of Secretary of State for India, and he was opposed to their appointment not in their capacity as individuals, but because they would have, from the very nature of the inquiry, to pass under review their own official conduct, while what was wanted was a free unfettered investigation of Indian financial administration. The right hon. Gentleman had, indeed, observed that there was no fear the official element would override their colleagues in the Committee, inasmuch as they would be only in the proportion of 5 in 22; but he would ask anyone who knew the calibre of those five noble Lords whether they would not, in the nature of things, have a far greater power than was represented merely by their numbers? For his own part, he very much feared that the Committee would be overridden by that select band of brothers. He appealed with confidence, therefore, to the independent Members of the House, to use their influence to secure that the inquiry should be free, for otherwise it would fail to give satisfaction. He could not believe that the present reformed House of Commons was less competent to inquire impartially and effectively into Indian affairs than any of its predecessors, and he therefore hoped that the proposal for a Joint Committee would not be pressed.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he fully agreed in the opinion that the range of inquiry assigned to the proposed Committee was sufficiently extended; but he felt certain that if a Joint Committee were appointed the official element would be most unduly predominant. The financial mismanagement of India—or, if that phrase were considered too strong, he would say the disordered state of the Indian finances—was the subject of inquiry; it would range over the administration of the last eight or nine years, which embraced the tenures of Office of four Indian Secretaries of State, and of one Governor General, who were now Members of the other House. They could scarcely fail to feel that their own administration was called in question, and that they were put upon their defence; but surely it would be inconsistent to place the conduct of the inquiry into the hands of the very officials whose administration was to be inquired into. No doubt, the opinions of so many distinguished men who had held the office of Secretary of State would be most valuable; but those opinions might be given to the Committee as evidence, and he should think that those noble Lords would themselves prefer to take the part of witnesses rather than serve as members of the Committee. He should be sorry to see it composed mainly of men who had been in the service of the State in India. What he desired was that a broad, independent, English view should be brought to bear on Indian affairs, and he was sure nothing could give the people of that country greater satisfaction than to find that the House of Commons manifested an interest in their well-being. A Committee, having upon it a large number of officials, would certainly fail to inspire the same confidence.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought that there should be some inquiry into our relations with the Hill Tribes, against whom 21 expeditions had been sent within the period between 1850 and 1868. He should not press this question now, but he begged to give Notice that when the Committee had concluded its labours he should bring it before the House. He was also of opinion that if the Government persisted in their determination to appoint a Joint Committee it should consist of 34 Members, 17 from each House. If official experience were deemed of so much value there were several right hon. Gentlemen—such, for instance, as his right hon. Friend the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) on the Bench below him—whose services might with great advantage be secured. In a letter, he might add, which he had received that morning from a very intelligent Indian gentleman residing in this country, views similar to those which had just been stated by the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield), as to the composition of the Committee, were put forward, and as they had not the advantage of the presence of any native of India he should venture to read it. He said—

“A Joint Committee is proposed. I have no objection to it; but I think, in fairness to the Committee and to the ex-officials themselves, they should not be on the Committee. I mean the ex-Secretaries of State and Governor Generals since 1860, for it is their own administration that is to be the subject of inquiry; and it would not be satisfactory, I am afraid, to the public that these ex-officials themselves should sit in judgment upon their own conduct. Their true place is in the witness-box, not on the Bench.”

Sir Charles Wingfield

For his part, he was glad to see that the Government had acceded to the wish of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) for a Committee of Inquiry; and though that inquiry might not be so extensive or in such a form as some persons might desire, he hoped, nevertheless, that great good would result from it.

MR. GILPIN said, if the Speaker ruled he was in Order, he should move “that there be added to the words of the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the following words:—‘and that such Committee be solely composed of Members of the House of Commons.’” He had sat in that House for 14 or 15 years, and the greatest dissatisfaction was always expressed about the East India accounts. They had been brought in at the fag-end of the Session to nearly empty Benches, when there were not more than a score of Members present; and the feelings of dissatisfaction—quite justifiable in the circumstances, had spread to the millions of our great Eastern dependency, who were naturally indignant at having been so treated. If they desired that this inquiry should be more than a “sham,” if it was really to suggest remedies for some of the evils connected with the finances of India, experts might be called upon with advantage to give evidence; but they should not be judges of a system in the administration of which they had been concerned. The subject of the inquiry was the financial conduct of the Government of India. The Committee would have to discuss all matters connected with the taxation of India, including the extent and pressure of the income tax; and he thought that such questions would be best discussed not by those who had spent the best part of their lives in India or in the India Office, but by Gentlemen acquainted with the principles of sound finance.

MR. KINNAIRD (to whom Mr. Gladstone gave way) observed that this inquiry was demanded by the people of India, but such a Committee as the Government proposed would not have their confidence. They had petitioned again and again for inquiry; there had been none since the government of India came into the hands of that House, and neither they nor the people of this country would be satisfied unless the Committee was composed entirely of Members of that House.

MR. DISRAELI: I give every credit to Her Majesty's Government for the motives which have induced them to make this proposition, and I feel sure they have only made it from a conviction that it was for the public advantage. But there are difficulties in the way which they ought to consider before asking the House to decide upon this course. The right hon. Gentleman regrets the absence of my right hon. Friend Sir Stafford Northcote. I also regret his absence on an occasion like the present, and I have no doubt I shall, in the course of the Session, have to regret it on other occasions. But, like the right hon. Gentleman, I am partially responsible for this absence, because my right hon. Friend would not have quitted the country at such a period without my assent, but there are occasions on which, when high political questions of Imperial importance arise, a public man, whatever his political party, owes his service to his country. In the course he has taken my right hon. Friend was influenced by motives of the highest character, and his political friends who will suffer by his absence were conscious of the sacrifice he was making and of the loss they would sustain. But they felt that, under the circumstances of the case, it was his duty to accede to the suggestion of the Government, and give his talents and his experience to the solution of difficulties which I trust will be removed by the Commission which Her Majesty's Government have resolved to appoint. With regard to the question before the House, there is no doubt that to ask for the appointment of a Joint Committee of the two Houses is a very unusual course. There have been Joint Committees of the two Houses. There was one last year, of which I was a Member. But wherever we have had Joint Committees of the two Houses they have been generally on technical points, issues of a limited character, such as arrangements about deposits for railways, and the subject considered by the last Joint Committee—namely, to expedite, if possible, the procedure of business between the two Houses. There the object in view was very intelligible, and it was not on the cards that the course taken by the Joint Committee would at all interfere with the privileges or the general conduct of business of either House. Even with this limitation, however, the instances of the appointment of a Joint Committee are rare. Now, in the present case, it must strike us at once that the proposal for a Joint Committee is not only on a large subject, but must deal with questions hitherto considered within the peculiar jurisdiction—if I may use the term—of this House—I mean the management of finance. We have all been for many years impressed with the conviction that the management of the finances of India much interests those who live in England. Otherwise, there would be no reason for the statement of those finances made to us every year. The ill-management of Indian finance must recoil ultimately upon the financial resources of this country. Therefore, it seems to me difficult for a Joint Committee to enter upon questions as to the present state of Indian finance without the Members of the other House being drawn into the consideration of matters in which it has always been one of the principal aims of this House to prevent them from interfering. This alone is, I think, a serious objection to the course proposed. The recommendation of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman has been that it is the only one that would insure the presence of adequate official experience. I would not depreciate the value of the presence of those who possess official experience in the government, and especially in the finances, of India. But the first question we have to decide is, whether it is worth while, in order to obtain the presence of this official experience, to take a course so unusual as the appointment of a Joint Committee of the two Houses, especially on a subject as to which, of all others, according to the traditions and principles of this House, concerted action by the two Houses should be avoided. Then, again, great as is the advantage of official experience, it is an advantage not without drawbacks. You may have too much official experience upon any Committee of this character, and therefore I think we should consider whether, out of our own resources, we may not be able to appoint a Committee which shall effectually inquire into this important subject, and furnish the House with the information and conclusions it requires. The right hon. Gentleman has referred particularly to this side of the House as being denuded of official experience by the absence of my right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote). I will not make any remark upon hon. Members opposite, and I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman is so well acquainted with them that he will be able to select many Members there whose assistance will be very valuable. But even on this side of the House, without the advantage of my right hon. Friend, or the presence of any who have been officially connected with the government and administration of India at home or abroad, there are several Gentlemen, I think, whose presence on this Committee would be highly valuable and beneficial, and who, in my opinion, would contribute to results which even Members with official experience might be unable to produce. There is my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Baring), who was Chairman of the Indian Committee which sat in 1852, and from the experience he acquired in carrying on and controlling that large investigation, as well as from his financial experience, I should say he would be most competent to sit on a Committee for considering Indian finance. I know well that my right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen Cave) has given great attention to Indian finance, and though he has not had official experience in Indian finance, he would form another competent member of the Committee. If such men as these were appointed, I am sure their labours would not be a source of shame to us. On the whole, although I fully appreciate the motives which have influenced the Government in making this suggestion—a fair suggestion for the consideration of the House—I cannot help feeling that the objections to the course proposed are weighty, and as upon a matter of this kind I should be sorry to see anything like a Division, I should be glad if the Government were to re-consider the proposition they have brought forward. It is a proposition which I do not think ought to be acceded to unless there were something approaching unanimity, and I hope the Government will find it consistent with their duty not to press its adoption upon the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose to Order, and inquired whether the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin) could be put from the Chair?

MR. SPEAKER: The only thing this House can do is to appoint a Committee of this House: it cannot appoint or prevent the appointment of a Committee of the other House; therefore, the Amendment could not properly be put.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had risen with the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) to shorten the discussion, but knowing the inflexible character of that hon. Gentleman, he had not persevered. The debate had proceeded quite far enough to satisfy, at least negatively, the condition he laid down in his own speech—that it being a proposal in some degree novel in character, he should not be justified in pressing it unless it met with the general approval of the House. He could not honestly say he was convinced by the arguments used against it. He hoped he should not be deemed disrespectful if he said that some of them partook of the nature of superstition; and as regarded the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), though he (Mr. Gladstone) must acknowledge it to have been conceived in the fairest possible spirit, he must express his decided dissent from one important point of principle which the right hon. Gentleman raised as regarded the competency of the House of Lords to deal with Indian finance. He (Mr. Gladstone) had been as ready as any man to defend the privileges of that House in matters of finance in critical and difficult circumstances; but so far as he was capable of forming an opinion, their exclusive rights with respect to finance arose solely out of the circumstance that they represented the people of England, and consequently their rights in no way extended to Indian finance. He believed the Acts of Parliament for regulating the government of India with reference to the presentation of accounts, &c., concerned the two Houses equally. He did not think it desirable, except on grounds of broad constitutional principle, that they should attempt to narrow the deliberative functions of the House of Lords. He would not, however, argue the point now, and would simply enter his protest against the acceptance of the principle laid down. He was satisfied that his proposal did not meet with that kind of approval which he thought desirable; he quite agreed that it should not be upon the vote of a mere majority that such a step should be taken; and therefore he should not press those subsequent measures which would have been necessary to give effect to the intention of the Government in case it had been thought fit to go forward with it. He assured the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) that the Motion had been framed to make out as large a province of inquiry as under present circumstances it was possible for any Committee to occupy in an efficient manner.

Motion agreed to.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. FAWCETT said, that in consequence of the question of clerical Fellowships not having been raised on the bringing up of the Report, the only means of re-opening the question now would be to re-commit the Bill for new clauses to be inserted; but, after consideration, he, and those who thought with him, came to the conclusion that it would not be wise on their part to resort to a course so unusual, because Her Majesty's Government having stated that their decision upon this point was irrevocable, a majority against them would be tantamount to throwing out the Bill for this Session. But, in listening to the Government on this point for the present, he by no means admitted the distinction drawn by the Solicitor General between the abuses the Bill corrected and the abuses connected with clerical Fellowships; and he had no doubt that when these and other matters connected with the Universities came to be dealt with in the future, with the object of bringing the Universities as far as possible within the reach of the greatest possible number of the population, the majority of the House would have occasion once more to condemn the piecemeal legislation of its predecessors.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would not stop to inquire whether the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett) was right in his calculation, that if he had reproduced his proposition it would have been supported by a majority; but he was bound to say that all the rumours he had heard led to a very different conclusion. But whether the hon. Member would have been supported by a majority or a minority, on either supposition he had exercised a wise discretion. He wished to remove two misapprehensions under which the hon. Gentleman laboured. He appeared to think he (Mr. Gladstone) had laid down a doctrine that the House of Commons was bound, when the House of Lords in one Session referred a Bill to a Select Committee, to send up to their Lordships the same Bill again in another Session. Now, in discussing that measure, he had invariably said that every independent Member of the House was perfectly free to take whatever course he thought politic and right, and that the restriction which he held to apply to their action applied to the Executive Government alone. Then the hon. Gentleman said that by the rejection of his Amendment they retained clerical Fellowships. That, he thought, was not an accurate description of the matter. When he placed that subject on the comparatively narrow ground of the position they stood in with reference to the House of Lords and to the parties promoting the Bill, he forewent a very great advantage. Without meaning to be disrespectful, he said that, as far as the University of Oxford was concerned, if the first Amendment had been adopted, it would have been entirely nugatory. He did not believe that upon the statutes of the University it would have had the smallest effect, good, bad, or indifferent. As to the second Amendment, he did not hesitate to congratulate the House upon its escape from it. It would have confirmed and aggravated the greatest abuse in the two Universities—namely, the existence of sinecure Fellowships, permanently held—a great stain, unquestionably, upon those institutions. Now, the obligation of taking Orders, whatever else might be said of it, as a practical measure, had the effect of making many Fellowships terminate at an early period, thereby preventing the multiplication and extension of those sinecure Fellowships held without limit of time. The hon. Gentleman might urge that it was not a satisfactory mode of restraining that evil to impose the obligation of taking Orders, nor did he himself say it was; but he said the second Amendment would have aggravated one of the greatest abuses in the Universities, and earnest academical reformers, chiefly resident members of the Universities, abstained from recommending that proposition because they knew it would not improve, but worsen, their system in regard to the tenure of Fellowships. As to religious instruction and worship, the effect of that Amendment, though probably not its intention, would have been to remove all certain provision whatever for the maintenance even of divine worship in the college chapels of the two Universities. Both he and his learned Friend the Solicitor General thought the question of Fellowships ought not to be allowed to sleep. The tenure of Fellowships was not a thing to be dealt with by a stroke of the pen. It was an old system, fortified by a number of conditions, which must be studied as a whole. Let them detach, if they could, the question of religious tests from that of general legislation upon Fellowships. But, first of all, they would watch the fate of that measure in “another place.” If it met with the success they hoped for, they would then apply themselves to considering what practical measures they could best take—whether by the authority of the Executive, or by invoking the aid of Parliament—for placing the Legislature and the Government in a position to deal effectively with the subject of Fellowships, and make the great and noble endowments of the colleges in their Universities as efficient as possible for the purposes for which they were intended. That promise that the subject should not be overlooked he freely gave to all who took an interest in it.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY desired that the part he took on the measure

might not be misunderstood. He much regretted that his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Walpole), who had intended to be there that evening, was prevented from being present by another loss sustained by his family, in addition to the one that previously occurred. For himself, he did not assent to the doctrines of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who proposed that the same Bill as was sent up last year should now be submitted to the House of Lords; and if he did not now oppose that proceeding, he must hold himself quite free to take any course he might think fit as to any Bill on that subject which might be introduced in a future Session. He should be very glad, indeed, if the question could be settled in such a way as to provide proper securities for religious teaching and discipline in the Universities, which the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted in principle to be desirable. As the Bill now stood, however, it did not provide those securities; and if it came before the House again in the same shape as it now stood, or near it, he should be prepared to resist it.

MR. FAWCETT explained that if he had carried his Amendment on Monday, he would have followed it up by a clause providing that no one, because he was in Holy Orders, should hold a Fellowship longer than if he were a layman.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL BILL—[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Solicitor General.)

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he would give a short explanation of the purport and objects of the measure. It would be recollected that the Pope, in September, 1850, issued a Bull, conferring, or professing to confer, certain ecclesiastical and territorial titles upon the Roman Catholic Prelates in England, and that this proceeding caused great excitement in this country. Indeed, the public feeling on the matter was so strong that the Government of the day had scarcely a choice but to introduce an Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. It was important that they should thoroughly understand the effect of that Act before they considered the question of repealing it. The state of the law previous to the passing of that Act was this—He held it to be undoubted that by the common law of this country, declared from time to time by statute, and more particularly by the 28th Henry VIII., which was repealed by an Act passed in the reign of Philip and Mary, but re-enacted again by the 1st of Elizabeth, any jurisdiction, any title conferred by the Pope or any foreign authority was absolutely without legal effect, or, in the words of the statutes, “null and void.” Such was the state of the law before the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was passed; such is now the state of the law, and such would remain the state of the law after the present Bill was passed. He wished that to be distinctly understood. But the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 10 Geo. IV. went beyond the Acts to which he had referred, and inflicted a penalty of £100 upon any Roman Catholic Bishop or other person who should assume any ecclesiastical title which was possessed by any member of the Established Church in England or Ireland. The Bull of the Pope, to which he had referred, of September, 1850, did not contravene the provisions of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, or, at all events, it was the opinion of the majority of the lawyers that it did not do so, for this reason, that the Bull did not authorize the assumption of any title actually held by Prelates of the Established Church, but the assumption of territorial titles other than those held by members of the Established Church; and it was to meet this aggression, as it was termed, that the Act which he now sought to repeal was introduced. By the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, persons were prohibited, under a penalty of £100, from assuming any ecclesiastical title in Great Britain and Ireland without proper authority. It was, however, at once seen that that Act would affect the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Scotland, and, therefore, an express exception was introduced into the Act to meet their case. Having stated the effect of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, he would proceed to give the reasons which had induced Her Majesty’s Government to seek to repeal that statute. It was not to be disputed that the Act was practically a dead letter; but he regretted to say that it had not been altogether inoperative, inasmuch as it had given rise to considerable irritation on the part of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and of alienating the Roman Catholic Prelates from the Government in Ireland. The present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, when giving evidence before a Committee of this House on the subject, had stated that he saw no reason, as the law now stood, to expect cordial personal intercourse between the Irish secular authorities and those who ruled the Roman Catholic Church—a circumstance which was to be regarded as a deep calamity in a country like Ireland. The question of the repeal of this statute had been considered by a Select Committee of that House which sat in 1867, and that Committee had reported in favour of the repeal of the Act, although he was bound at the same time to say that a Committee of the other House had reported in an opposite sense. It was a great evil to retain on the statute book penalties which were not enforced. But the case for the repeal of the Act did not rest here. The disestablishment of the Irish Church by the Act of last year made the passing of the present Bill a matter of absolute necessity, because, as the law now stood, every Bishop of the disestablished Church appointed after the 1st of January, 1871, who should assume an ecclesiastical title, would be subjected to a penalty of £100 under it; and, therefore, if it were allowed to remain on the statute book, it would altogether prevent the working of that Church. An hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Charley) intended to propose the rejection of the Bill. Now, he presumed that the hon. Gentleman did not think that the Bishops of the Established Church ought to be subject to a penalty for assuming ecclesiastical titles. This point could only be dealt with in two ways. Either the statute must be repealed altogether, or Parliament must pass a measure exempting Protestant Bishops from its operation whilst Roman Catholic Bishops would still be liable—a course that would scarcely be consistent with the sacrifice they had submitted to in order to establish religious equality in Ireland. In endeavouring to repeal the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, the Government had been careful not to go further than was absolutely necessary, and, therefore, they had not attempted to touch the provisions of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, which would remain in force, and under which Roman Catholic Bishops would be prohibited from assuming titles held by Prelates of the Church of England. It would certainly be most inconvenient if there were two Archbishops of Canterbury; but he presumed that it was not the intention of the Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church to assume such titles. Feeling the importance that would attach to the wording of this Bill, he proposed, in the event of the House permitting it to be read a second time, to refer it to a Select Committee, in order that the precise words in which the measure should be drawn should be deliberately determined upon. He trusted that the majority of the House would feel that the repeal of the statute in question was necessary not merely in the interest of the Protestant Church of Ireland, but of religious liberty. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. CHARLEY, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, observed that when the Earl of Kimberley introduced the Bill, he stated that he did so on account of the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland. That view had been taken by the Attorney General. The Solicitor General for Ireland, in the debate on the second reading of a similar measure which had been introduced last year, stated his belief that the existing Prelates of the disestablished Church in Ireland would not be affected by the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, although those appointed subsequently to January, 1871, would be affected by them. He much admired the modesty of the Solicitor General for Ireland, and he only wished he could say the same of the Attorney General for England. He was prepared to show that it was impossible to escape from the dilemma propounded by Lord Cairns, that the Bill, if intended merely for the relief of the Irish Protestant Bishops, either did too much or too little. It did too much, because it extended to Great Britain, where it was not wanted. It did too little, because it did not repeal the 24th section of the Catholic Emancipation Act. This last-named Act was sanctioned by the great names of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel; but it was necessary to pass the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, because His Holiness the Pope adroitly shielded his nominees from the penalties imposed by appointing them to sees bearing names differing from those of the sees in the Established Church. The Earl of Kimberley last year, in endeavouring to meet the objection that the repeal of the 24th section of the Catholic Emancipation Act was necessary to relieve perfectly the Protestant Bishops in Ireland, said—

"Next January the clause will not apply to any Irish Bishop; for as there will be no bishoprics established by law in Ireland there will be no titles which the Bishops of any Church will be prohibited from assuming."—[3 Hansard, cci. 1472.]

"After the Church in Ireland has ceased to be established, there is no longer any objection in that country to any person assuming the title of his see from any town, the name of which had formerly been appropriated to a see of the Established Church."—[Ibid. 1486.]

The language of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act and that of the Catholic Emancipation Act showed that the former was merely an Act for the extension of the latter by the use of the words, "be or be not the province, or co-extensive with the province, of any Archbishop, &c.," of the Established Church, and as that took in any new sees the Parliament was even with the Pope. According to the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, any person might assume the title formerly held by the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of Ireland; but those dignitaries never had assumed the title of any see, and they never would assume any other than those formerly held by them under the sanction of the law; and, therefore, if they were to be sued it must be under the 24th section of the Catholic Emancipation Act, and they could cite the Lord Chancellor as an authority that they were liable to no penalties under that Act, and, à fortiori, they were not under the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, and, therefore, that apprehended danger was purely imaginary. The Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland had no grievance to complain of, because if they were sued they also could plead the opinion of the Lord Chancellor in their favour. The law with regard to Bulls was, no doubt, as the learned Attorney General had stated it; any person introducing Papal Bulls into this country was liable to the law of præmunire. In Earl Russell's time Lord Romilly, the then Attorney General, and Sir Alexander Cockburn, the present Lord Chief Justice, who was at that time Solicitor General, went into the question of penalties. They found they were somewhat rusty and antiquated, and suggested that a simple remedy ought to be substituted, and that of £100 was substituted. The Bulls spoken of in the Ecclesiastical Titles Act were not Bulls at all, but such as were mentioned in the Preamble of the Act—namely, Bulls creating pretended sees similar to those the Pope created in England in 1850. The Irish Roman Catholic Bishops had no more a grievance than had the Irish Protestant Bishops of that country, being placed on perfect equality for the future. He agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), in the law with regard to Scotland which he laid down last Session. The Act of 1829 did not mention Scotland in its enacting part, but the Act of 1851 did extend to that country, and, therefore, if they repealed that Act they would sweep away all the obstacles to the establishment of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in that country taking territorial titles from places within its boundary; not that he supposed the souls of Scotch Presbyterians would be much troubled by the Pope treating them as heretics. The 3rd clause of the Act, as it related to Scotland, was not, as the Attorney General had said, a violation of religious equality. It did not in the least change the condition of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. It left it where it found it; but it exempted the Church of Scotland from the penalties under the Act. In 1851 Sir George Grey, in reply to a Question from a Roman Catholic Member, said that the Scotch Bishops stood on a totally different footing to the Roman Catholic Bishops, inasmuch as they did not hold their office through the appointment of a foreign Power. There was nothing he said in the law that gave them power to assume those titles, but it left them just where they were before. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said he agreed with the right hon. Baronet that there was a distinction between Bishops holding office by foreign appointment and authority, and those who did not so hold them, and the clause was read a third time without a Division. The Roman Catholic Bishops of Scotland had never assumed territorial titles taken from places in that country, and therefore they had never been subjected to the penalty of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. They laboured under no grievance, and the only object for sweeping away the Ecclesiastical Titles Act could be to entitle them to assume in Scotland territorial titles derived from places there. He did not envy any Scotch Member who voted for the second reading of the Bill, and if he did, he hoped the vote of want of confidence adopted in Glasgow would not be thrown away. In England there was an Established Church the form of which was Episcopal, and, as the Attorney General had said, it was thought inexpedient that there should be two Archbishops of Canterbury or two Bishops of London, and, therefore, the Government did not propose to repeal the 24th section of the Catholic Emancipation Act; but that it was very expedient to have an Archbishop of Westminster whose jurisdiction, though derived from a foreign source, did not conflict with theirs. The Ecclesiastical Titles Act was, however, passed with special reference to England. As Lord Russell said, we had no remedy against the Pope, who appointed Bishops in this country, to whom he assigned English territorial titles; but we had a remedy against Dr. Manning, and now the Government proposed to deprive us of that remedy against Dr. Manning. It was not true that Dr. Manning's jurisdiction as Archbishop of Westminster did not conflict with that of the Bishop of London, because Westminster formed a part of the diocese of the Bishop of London. This was not the time to exalt the Church of Rome when all the civilized nations of the Continent of Europe found it indispensable to curb her exorbitant pretensions; and when they considered the magnificent cathedral the Church of Rome intended to build in the neighbourhood of that House, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London might well hide their diminished heads as the representatives of the Protestant Constitution. The Attorney General had said that, in fact, the penalties imposed by the Ecclesiastical Titles Act had never been enforced, and that in consequence it was inexpedient to get rid of them. He would remind the House that the Catholic Emancipation Act provided that the penalties should be enforced by the Attorney General himself; but Lord Chelmsford introduced a clause into the Ecclesiastical Titles Act which provided that they might be enforced by any person with the consent of the Attorney General. If, then, the penalties were not enforced, whose fault was it? Why the Attorney General, who would not give his consent to their being recovered. It was, therefore, idle to talk of their not being enforced. How long, he asked, would the people of this country endure this sort of thing. He could not say; but this he knew, that when the Prime Minister of England began to notice the Pope it was high time for the House of Commons to notice the Prime Minister. In official documents issued that morning it would be found that the right hon. Gentleman sent a powerful man-of-war to await the wishes of the Holy Father, and he thought it was inconsistent in a statesman, after recommending Her Majesty to sanction the confiscation of the property of the Irish Church, that he should be afterwards found taking steps to protect the property of the Irish College at Rome. He saw by that morning's paper that the Roman Catholic ladies of England had presented an address to His Holiness, in which they said they must congratulate him on the triumph in store for him, and he should like to know if the Prime Minister intended to adorn that triumph. An opinion was gaining ground out-of-doors that in his efforts to subdue and subjugate and break down the will of the people Archbishop Manning had a willing ally in the Prime Minister of England. When a question was put to the right hon. Gentleman whether he had lately become reconciled to the Church of Rome, why did he shuffle with the question, instead of giving it a straightforward denial like an honest Englishman, if it were not true? Of this he (Mr. Charley) was quite certain that the Protestant establishments of this country would never be destroyed except by the false friends of Protestantism. Would to God the right hon. Gentleman were a member of the Church of Rome, for then he could not do half the evil he had done to Protestantism as a member of the Protestant Church. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said*: Sir, I am aware that it would be convenient to Roman Catholic Members to allow this debate to drop. I saw an hon. Member rise on this side of the House, a Roman Catholic Member (Mr. H. Matthews), with whom I had the honour of serving on the Committee appointed last Session to inquire into the conventual and monastic institutions which are so rapidly increasing in this country, and I can answer for it that, subject to the directions which that hon. Member, no doubt, receives, he is prompt on every occasion to lend his legal acumen to the defence of the interests which are seeking shelter from the purview of the law. When I saw that hon. Member rise to address the House, I own I was rather surprised to observe how suddenly he sat down again. The hon. Member had evidently received a signal which purported that it is now half-past 7 o'clock, and that a Division "snapped" at this particular moment would not have represented the real opinion of the House: so, seeking to avoid a fair decision of the House, down sat the hon. Member. Sir, this is but one instance of the tactics which have prevailed among the Roman Catholic party, and in the Committee to which I have referred; and it is by such devices that the rapid progress—the rapid political progress—of the Papacy in this country has been promoted. It is, moreover, through the extreme ignorance that prevails with regard to the real nature of the aggression that the Act of 1851, which it is now sought to repeal, was intended to counteract. Sir, it is the pleasure of some hon. Members to assume that England, in 1851, was mad; and that this House, although the debates continued during the whole Session, was pursuing a chimera in enacting a law upon no novel principle, but enacting a law which though something more, still is clearly declaratory of the ancient law of this kingdom which existed from before the Conquest, because the

Sovereigns of England, whoever held the sovereign power in this country, had always found it necessary to restrain the pretensions of the Papacy. And why? Because, while pretending to "spiritual" authority only, the Papacy has ever given to that term such an extensive interpretation that "spiritual," according to that interpretation, includes all temporal interests. Now, Sir, in order to show that this doctrine is not abandoned, I will, with the permission of the House, quote a passage from a very remarkable work which has recently been published. This work is the sequel to another work entitled Janus, in which the views of educated Germans—I mean Roman Catholic Germans—as to the probable purpose and effect of the Council then about to be held at Rome, were given. That work was followed by the production of the work to which I am referring, and which is entitled Quirinus. These Roman Catholics, being, I believe, distinguished ecclesiastics, understand the persecuting power of Rome's jurisdiction so well that they dare not publish their own names; at the same time, the authority of those works is well known and is indisputable. Quirinus consists of a number of letters which were written by three persons of different nations, who were resident at Rome during the Session of the Council, and they conveyed to a centre in Germany—a Roman Catholic centre in Germany—from week to week what their respective writers were enabled to gather from the members of the Council, until at last his Holiness the Pope became so alarmed at the publication of the proceedings of the Council, that, on the 14th of January last, he pronounced it to be a deadly sin to publish anything connected with those proceedings, or relating to the Council, except by way of laudation. After that declaration, or rather condemnation, by the Chief of the Roman Catholic Church, who was then also Sovereign of the Roman States and of the city of Rome, it is not likely that we should obtain any more direct evidence of what passed in the Council than what was thus furnished us from Germany in the pages of the work entitled Quirinus. Let me, in passing, recommend every hon. Member in this House to procure copies of this work, and of the companion volume Janus, for the sake of preserving the history of this remarkable Council. They are published by Rivington and Co., and there is little probability of any other history of these transactions appearing more distinctly in our lifetime. In the Appendix to this work, Quirinus, the speech of M. Darboy, Archbishop of Paris, is given. He is a most remarkable, a most distinguished, and a most exemplary Prelate. I would recall to the recollection of the House that it was this Archbishop of Paris who remonstrated, five or six years since, against the intrusion of the Pope's power into his diocese to the supersession of his own lawful jurisdiction—lawful, that is, under the canon law, as exercised over the regular religious monastic and conventual Orders in Paris; and that the Pope censured this Archbishop because, as Archbishop, he had represented to His Holiness that, by the canon law, by the Concordat, and by the fundamental laws of France, he was only performing his duty as a Bishop in exercising visitatorial power over the regular Orders and their houses; and yet the Pope, acting upon the principle which has now found its full development in the decrees of the Council, threatened to supersede the Archbishop. The Pope set at nought the canon law, and defied the law of France then, as he is now defying the law of England. And it is in deference to this defiance that the House of Commons is asked to repeal this statute of 1851, which is declaratory of the ancient law that our forefathers had, for 800 years at least, found to be necessary for the preservation of their independence as citizens of this free country. Sir, the Archbishop of Paris was bold enough to oppose the dogma of Papal infallibility and the Schema for the re-organization of the Roman Catholic Church not upon the principle of a Church at all, but upon the principle of political conspiracy, whereby all rights under the canon law of Rome—that canon law which constitutes her as a Church—may at any moment, by the sole dictum of the Pope, pronounced ex cathedra by some secret conclave held at Rome, be superseded; and the arbitrary will of the Pope may thus be enforced upon the Roman Catholics of any district, of any province, or of any country, to the supersession of their known and ancient rights under the canon law. What says the Archbishop of Paris? In a speech delivered on the 20th of May last, on the Con-

“The compilers of the Schema, whether they desire it or not, are introducing a new era of mischief, if the subject-matter of Papal infallibility is not accurately defined, or if it can be supposed that under the head of morals the Pope will give decisions on the civil and political acts of Sovereigns and nations, laws and rights, to which a public authority will be attributed. Everyone of any political cultivation knows what seeds of discord are contained in our Schema, and to what perils it exposes even the temporal power of the Holy See.”

The Archbishop of Paris thus warned the Council, and has thus fortunately warned the world, that the proceedings of that Council have invested the Pope with the power of pronouncing, as necessary to salvation, what shall be or what shall not be the political acts of Roman Catholic Prelates, and of Catholics generally throughout the world. Well, Sir, the Bill before the House is clearly intended for the encouragement of Archbishop Manning; intended for the promotion of Archbishop Manning, and intended for the promotion of Cardinal Cullen. Cardinal Cullen condemned the Archbishop of Paris at a meeting which was held immediately after the Council separated, and said he hoped that all such opinions as his—that all opinions which represented the ancient Constitution, the ancient Gallican liberties of the Roman Catholic Church of France, would be swept into oblivion. To the speech of the Archbishop of Paris, which I have quoted to the House, there is a note appended by the author of Quirinus, which refers to a passage in a well-known sermon, preached in 1869 at Kensington by Archbishop Manning. Archbishop Manning announced that the Pope will give decisions on the civil and political acts of Sovereigns and nations, laws and rights, to which a public authority will be attributed. In this note the writer affirms so; that the acts of the Pope, as infallible, when pronounced ex cathedra, will be political.

“This is emphatically asserted,” says the author, “in a sermon preached last year at Kensington by Archbishop Manning, where he says, speaking in the Pope’s name—‘I claim to be the supreme judge and director of the consciences of men; of the peasant that tills the field and the prince that sits on the throne; of the household that lives in the shade of privacy, and the Legislature that makes laws for kingdoms—I am the sole last supreme judge of what is right and wrong.’”

Mr. Newdegate

Now, the House is asked by this Bill to pass a statute to legalize a title in Dr. Manning which the law has condemned, and to relieve him from penalties, in order that he may in this metropolis carry out this doctrine as to the Pope’s supremacy in all matters, whether private, public, or political; yet I find the House scarcely deigning to give any attention to the subject, as if it could afford to treat with contemptuous indifference the purposes and designs of a person like Dr. Manning, who, as thus authorized by the Pope, is known already to have had an enormous influence in moulding the Members of this House to effect the subversion of the Church of Ireland. I myself have witnessed the exertions of Dr. Manning in the Lobbies of this House, and when I know that they were intended to promote that which has been described and condemned as an idolatrous tyranny by an Archbishop of Paris, the murdered predecessor of the present Archbishop, and by the Count de Montalembert, as I showed the House last year when I read to the House the letter of the late Count de Montalembert, in which he quoted Archbishop Sibour, the predecessor of the present Archbishop of Paris, whose eloquent words of remonstrance in the Council I have now quoted; I ask, is it not lamentable that this House of Commons should be either so ignorant or indifferent as to the action of these influences, that most of the Benches are empty, and that the representatives of the Opposition are all absent? Can this be regarded as a true representation of the feeling of the country? You pretend that this House has been elected by household suffrage. Do you represent the ignorance or the intelligence of the country? [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh; and yet this very evening a large section, if not the majority, of this House will do the bidding of this very power for which they affect contempt. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General says that, after all we have done for the safe establishment of religious liberty, would it not be fitting to do this one thing more, and extend to the Roman Catholic Bishops an equal right to assume territorial titles with the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Archbishop of York? Why, says he, can we not take this other little step in the direction of establishing religious equality? Has the hon. and learned Gentleman ever asked Dr. Manning whether he is willing to accept now, henceforth, and for ever, on the part of the see of Rome, the doctrine of religious equality? It happens—and I referred to this question last year—that in the Committee on Conventual and Monastic Institutions, Lord Clifford was examined as a witness; and I rejoiced to see a nobleman appear as a witness, of whose private character I had heard so much that I knew I might have perfect confidence in his honour. He said, in effect—“All that we ask is that the law should take no notice of those monastic and conventual institutions. Leave us alone. Take no notice of us: leave us free to establish these institutions. We desire that the law of England should not interfere in ecclesiastical or religious matters. We wish the law to regard as equal the Church of England, the establishment of the Protestant Nonconformists and Dissenters, and these establishments of the Church of Rome, and should meddle with none of them.” I then put several times this question to Lord Clifford—“Suppose the law either treats as equals the institutions of all denominations and ignores all their institutions, will the Church of Rome be satisfied to remain on terms of equality with the Wesleyans, Independents, Baptists, Church of England, and other denominationalists?” I pressed that question home, and Lord Clifford, as an honourable man, at length appealed to the Chairman not to permit what he described as so extreme a question to be pressed, and I ceased to urge it, because I knew perfectly well that, if Lord Clifford should speak the truth, judging from the speeches he himself had made at certain meetings, he must have declared that the demand for religious equality is merely regarded by the advocates of Rome as a step towards the establishment of her supremacy. Do you desire to encourage this ambition? Does this House condemn the Italians because they have found the temporal jurisdiction of the Pope intolerable? Are you prepared to authorize the Prime Minister to do the only thing he could do consistently with the Diplomatic Relations Act; not to send the forces of England to restore the spiritual authority of the Pope—for that the law forbids—but do you urge that he should send the forces of England to restore the temporal authority of the Pope as temporal sovereign of the quondam Pontifical States and of Rome? And, if you are not prepared to inflict that injury upon the Italian people, how can you be so little considerate for the interests of the people of England as to further the progress of the Papal power in this country, and permit the establishment here of a power and jurisdiction which the Italians, who have known it most fully, utterly repudiate? Remember this, that except in the exaggerated sense which the Pope has now distinctly affixed to the term “religion,” and therefore to the word “spiritual,” this is not by any means merely a religious question, because prior to the Brief of 1850 the Roman Catholics in this country enjoyed as much religious freedom as any other denomination in it. There are certain things to which no denomination has a right; because such right, if permitted, would trench upon the rights and liberty of others; those things only were forbidden to the Roman Catholics which are encroachments upon the rights of others. We know that for every function of their religion, in the sense in which we understand the term “religion,” the Vicars Apostolic were sufficient; we know this also, that it was with the view of establishing the jurisdiction of the canon law in this country that the well-known Brief of Aggression was issued in 1850. It is a question of jurisdiction, therefore, and of temporals, not a question of religion properly understood, that we are considering. Why, I have here beside me the appeal which Cardinal Wiseman issued with the object of soothing the irritation, in 1851, which this intrusion of a foreign Power and jurisdiction had created. And how did he justify the Brief; for it was this Brief which has caused all the irritation; the act of the Pope, and not the Act of Parliament, which condemned it. He then stated in the Brief the intervention of his authority was necessary in order to constitute a hierarchy which, being convened in Synod, would have jurisdiction according to the canon law of Rome. That is the purport of the declaration then made by the highest Roman Catholic authority; and it was in answer to that declaration that the Act of 1851 was passed. That Act of Parliament declared, in answer to the Pope's agreement—"You shall not exercise this jurisdiction as of right. We claim, as the representatives of the English nation, that supremacy for our chief and head, the Queen, in conjunction with the two Houses of Parliament, which has existed from time immemorial, and we will not allow this intrusion upon our freedom. We will guard the liberties of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, which have grown up under the previous organization of their Church in England, and you shall not thrust them down. You shall not use your power to collect into the hands of the Bishops, your nominees, the property which the Roman Catholic laity of England, intend shall be vested in their priests or in lay trustees. You shall not monopolize this property in the hands of your Bishops under the direction of a Cardinal." That was the answer of Parliament under the state of things existing in 1851. Now there has been a great change in the Roman Church; the rights of the Bishops have, by the acts of this Council, been rendered liable to supercession at any moment by the mere dictum of the Pope, and the case support of the statute of 1851; the case is still stronger, because it is not with the Bishop of a diocese, or the Archbishop of a province, that the priest or layman who would retain his property will have to contend, but he will have to contend directly with the Pope himself, against whom, as Lord Russell wisely said, there is, in fact, no remedy. The House will forgive the earnestness with which I speak; but it really seems to me that hon. Members overlook the gravity of the subject with which they are now dealing. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General asked why should we not soothe the irritation which exists, and which has been created, as he wrongly said, in consequence of this law, which you are asked to repeal. In answer to that, I declare that the irritation among Roman Catholics has not been created by this law, but that it has been created by the Brief—the document from Rome—which rendered the passing of this law necessary; and I will prove it. I will give hon. Members an idea of the terms of brotherly love and desire for equality which actuate those who so ardently urge the repeal of this Act. When the Committee of this House, appointed to consider the statute of 1851, in 1867, was sitting, Mr. Hope Scott was examined as a witness—and let me remind hon. Members that the Protestant Church of Ireland then existed as a national establishment. It happened that in that Committee there was an almost equal division of opinion, and that my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. S. Walpole) proposed a draft Report, whilst the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. MacEvoy), who was in the Chair, and is a Roman Catholic, prepared another. The Report of my right hon. Friend was rejected by a majority of 1. In the draft Report proposed by my right hon. Friend, this passage occurs—

"Nor is it altogether unimportant to remark that this claim to a territorial hierarchy 'as morally necessary to the Roman Catholic Church in England,' could only be recognized according to the opinion of the Roman Catholics themselves, by a negation or denial (practically speaking) of the existing Establishment, and the authority of its Bishops."

Now, this had reference to Ireland, and the House has since gratified this desire of the Papacy for territorial authority, by disestablishing the Church of Ireland. In that Committee, Mr. Hope Scott was asked this question—

"Then, if any Bishop were to intrude into the see of another Bishop in this country, it would be in the eye at least of that portion of the Church which was in this country, a schismatical act?"

His answer was—

"There is no doubt at all about it; the fact is that the Roman Catholic Church would not be justified in placing Bishops anywhere in England or in Ireland, if it did not deny the authority, practically speaking, of the Bishops of the Establishment—it is, of course, an issue between the two religions, which it is of no use blinking."

Therefore, according to the authority of one of the most accomplished lawyers in this country, the reason—the chief reason—which has actuated Parliament in disestablishing the Church in Ireland must have been to gratify the demand of the Roman Catholic hierarchy for its extinction. But let me go on. Mr. Hope Scott was further asked—

"But the Roman Catholic Church assumes that the English Episcopate has no existence?"

"Most undoubtedly. The appointment of any ecclesiastical officer whatever of the Roman Catholic religion, and the appointment of any priest exercising cure of souls, is a negation of the Es-established Church, and that is, of course, a part of the religion which is supposed to be freed by the Act of 1829."

Those who passed the Act of 1851 deemed it necessary to restrain this desire on the part of a foreign Power, and the representatives of a foreign Power, for the disestablishment of the Church of England and of Ireland. Therefore, they passed this enactment, the penalties of which you are now asked to repeal, and thereby give full scope for the exercise of this foreign jurisdiction. I see that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister is preparing to speak. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, or one of his learned Colleagues, to answer me this question—When you speak of the spiritual authority of the Church of Rome, and say that its jurisdiction is spiritual, can you deny, after what has passed in the late Council at Rome, that the term "spiritual," according to the understanding of Rome, includes also temporal jurisdiction? Is it not a mere pretence to say that it is sufficient to restrain Rome in what she considers temporal, when you know that it has always been held by her that temporals are included in and are subordinate to spirituals? Is there not a want of candour in thus dealing with the subject? But the question really extends beyond this. The hon. and learned Gentleman told me, when he introduced this Bill, that he was merely going to present to the House a Bill for the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act as it was presented to the House of Lords. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: As it passed through the Committee of the House of Lords.] And he spoke as if there was very little opposition on the second reading. Certainly there was not a Division, because the House came to a distinct understanding that the Bill was to be altered in Committee. Alterations were made in it in the Committee of the House of Lords; but every one of those alterations you last Session rejected. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that the Bill stands as it was introduced into the House of Lords. Well, here is what Lord Russell then said of it. Lord Russell was speaking on the 27th of May on the second reading of the Bill, as then introduced, and he said he did not suppose that the Government would persist in their adherence to the exact form in which it was drawn, and he trusted that, when it went into Committee, they would amend it and make it more consonant with reason. This is the Bill, then, which the Liberal Government ask us to pass the second reading of. The House of Lords passed it through a second reading, and amended it in Committee; and the Amendments were rejected in this House. Those Amendments were drawn by Lord Cairns, and what was the substance of them? In the Bill of last Session you described Her Majesty by a novel title—as "the Sovereign of this country." That was quite a new definition to introduce into an Act of Parliament. We have hitherto been accustomed, when we legislate, to legislate not with reference to the Sovereign only, but with reference to the Constitution, of which Her Majesty is the chief Officer and hereditary Head; and Lord Cairns introduced into the former Bill clauses reserving the rights not of the Sovereign of these realms, but of Her Majesty and her successors, thus recognizing the Act of Settlement, thus recognizing the Constitution, thus preventing it from appearing that it is a contest between Queen Victoria and Pope Pius; but recognizing it as a contest which is continued between the independent Crown of England and the chief of a great political confederacy. The Home Secretary was, however, so determined that there should be no recognition of the Act of Settlement, or of the succession to the Throne, or of the Constitution of this country, that, although my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers) proposed to insert the words which are current in every Act of Parliament touching the Constitution, the right hon. Gentleman divided the House twice against the hon. and learned Gentleman, and succeeded in casting the words out, although my hon. and learned Friend was merely asking the House to accept the decision of the House of Lords with reference to the proper terms and purport of a Bill which dealt with matters of jurisdiction of this grave kind. And then the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) comes down and says—"Oh! this is a very small matter. I am merely proposing to the House that they should carry out the doctrine of religious equality. In 1851, when the Act was passed, the nation was mad, and the House of Commons was
